They've all worked for a celebrity chef at some point in their careers, and perhaps because of it, still stand in their mentors' shadows. Bissonnette sees the desire for fame as self-defeating: "It's a double-edged sword, because if you're trying to make it big you're probably not going to. I mean, for Christ's sake, Frank McClelland and Ken Oringer started cooking when I started going to culinary school. And I was told I was doing something stupid because cooks only were cooks because they couldn't do something else." Of the group, Faison is the most recognizable from her brush with fame on season one of Top Chef. And she can attest to the differences in kinds of celebrityhood. She even has her own Wikipedia entry, and a fellow competitor's exasperated insult became a popular T-shirt slogan, "I'm not your bitch, bitch." But being famous for being a reality TV show villain is different from the more elusive renown of professional excellence, something Faison is still seeking as she tries to put her heavily edited past behind. "To me this is a marathon, not a sprint," she says about turning her back on her 15 minutes of fame. "I moved to Nantucket. The greatest gift [I learned there from Straight Wharf chef Amanda Lydon] was you're not a less intense chef if you put your heart on the plate. It would have been nice to learn that before the show."

Colin Lynch had his own televised mishap. One of his rare breakdowns in the kitchen happened on camera for ABC's TV show Boston 24/7, when he was an intern for Lynch. The 2002 minidocudrama aimed to present a slice of life in Boston, filming various professionals at work, including those in the kitchen of No. 9 Park. In the restaurant episode, Lynch catches a young, overwhelmed Colin undersalting a salad and chews him out. He recalls her yelling, "You'll never make it in the industry. You can't do it." But what he wishes the show recorded was a scene that happened later that night. When service was over, Lynch gathered all the chefs together to tell their stories of having been berated earlier in their careers. That moment "was my redemption," he beams, remembering how he eagerly turned to the cameraman to make sure it was being filmed only to be told, "Too bad. I'm out of batteries."

Like the camera, diners get only glimpses of the people who plate their food. It's a divide that Faison sees in socioeconomic terms and is keen to bridge. She praises the openness of O Ya's kitchen, and observes that "putting walls up instead of allowing the chef to be soulful... brings up the question of whether the chef is part of the help." Instead, she shares owners Tim and Nancy Cushman's vision of a "democratic and not precious" dining experience. O Ya might be one of the most touted restaurants in the country, but its clientele is just as likely to be dressed in flip-flops and T-shirts as business casual. But considering O Ya is also one of the most expensive restaurants in the city, where a piece of sashimi can cost $28, the movement towards democracy is a movement away from fine dining's pretentiousness and fuss, and not so much away from its prices. Instead, Faison uses language that recalls a spiritual revolution, envisioning more diners turning from the rituals of white-tableclothed rooms and toward the casual, unscripted worship of food. "The old-school sense of fine dining is dying," she says. "People eat out two to three times a week, and they're rearing a new generation of not only upcoming chefs but diners. People don't want to sit in a room that's church-pew-like." In this New Age of eating, chefs' trendy techniques often battle with diners' personal, emotional connection to their creations. "In our culture," Faison explains, "there's a disconnect between technology and spirituality. Food is going through the same struggle. It's important for me that people say my food is good, before they say it's interesting."

Tiffani Faison

While O Ya is purposely designed to level distinctions between chefs and diners, and between diners themselves, with each place setting including both chopsticks and a fork to avoid potential embarrassment, it's the menus of Clio and L'Espalier which have benefited from their rising chefs' openness to varied experiences. Grundy, whom Bissonnette calls "one of the best cooks I've ever met," might have at his disposal at Clio such rare ingredients as lily bulbs, pine ash and hibiscus gels to play with, but he counts his childhood in Queens as a primary inspiration, referencing it on the menu with a lime-rib dish like the one his dad barbecued at home. "I like molecular stuff," Grundy says. "But I treat it for what it is. [Food has to be] based in tradition. You can't come to Clio and have a bubble and a bunch of foam. It's a myth." Similarly Hackney encourages L'Espalier's cooks to use their childhood experiences as a catalyst. "A lot of our dishes come from culinary memories," Hackney says. "Dishes which remind me of places I've been, things I've done. And with a mixed culture in the kitchen, you can really absorb that from people who talk about what happened as a kid. My job is to interpret that into L'Espalier's style." Having been at L'Espalier for eight years, Hackney has added more Indian spices to the dishes because he particularly misses the curry houses from his English upbringing. Were he to open his own restaurant, it also would reflect his preferred way of eating, casually and communally. "Family style high-end dining where you bring the food out, and people help themselves but it would still be a great level of expertise," he says. "That's my favorite way of eating, to lay the food out and graze gradually on it… in a really relaxed atmosphere."

Buehler, who put his grandmother Mary Hovan's pierogis on KO Prime's menu, shares that preference for the rustic and laid-back. "Simple, humble plates you want to get involved in," he explains. "Not plates of food that look like an erector set attacked with an airbrush." Kyriakides Piuma also gravitates toward clarity and simplicity: "I like food that's playful and has spirit but without going too far off the reservation." Bina Osteria's Asaro, who has cooked for some of the city's most well-heeled, dreams of opening three interconnected businesses, none of which are particularly glamorous: a bakery/coffeeshop, sandwich shop and a bistro. Kyriakides Piuma sees herself opening a "funky mezze bar with tapas. And artists on the wall," a place "focusing less on fine dining service and more on solid, Mediterranean food" that can be shared as small plates with a group of friends. Even Barbin, perhaps the most classically trained of the new generation of chefs, has been introducing fun, contemporary touches to Sensing's offerings, including a foie gras terrine with popcorn, a dish that purists might not care for but which remains popular with diners.

This nascent pull away from stylized refinement in the direction of connection and community reflects what's happening in the kitchen, as more people from diverse backgrounds rotate through. One of the people who's helping make that happen locally is Toni Elka, the enthusiastic founder and executive director of Future Chefs, a nonprofit that partners with restaurants, high schools and culinary programs to award internships and scholarships to local students. "In a kitchen, you have to be a team," Elka says at a Future Chefs cooking contest. "You have to subvert the individual to the whole. There may be celebrity chefs, but they're not the chef commanding the kitchen." As she speaks, local restaurant pioneer Chris Douglass of Ashmont Grill and Tavolo wanders around, jotting down notes on his judge's scoresheet. The high-schoolers, all intense concentration and furrowed faces, do a good job of masking their nervousness. The team aspect of culinary work which Elka is talking about is nowhere better reflected than in this scene—of a successful chef helping a future generation of aspirants. It's a lesson that Kyriakides Piuma knows well from her six years learning from Sortun. "A good chef," she says, "is someone who inspires others to do the best they can do." ***

TOO MANY CHEFS

THE IMPROPER'S INCOMPLETE GUIDE TO RESTAURANT RELATIONS

BY THAIS COLLINS

CALL IT SIX DEGREES OF LYDIA SHIRE. When we started culling Boston's restaurant scene to anoint a new generation of celebrity chefs, certain names kept popping up. Intrigued, we decided to dig deeper, uncovering the roots of one huge and incestuous family tree.

Our search began in the 1980s with the forebears. At that time, Shire and Jasper White worked together at the former Bostonian Hotel. Across town, a then-unknown Todd English opened Olives, his first restaurant. Sweating in the heat of the stovetops, we met familiar faces: Barbara Lynch as one of English's line cooks; Paul O'Connell, now at Chez Henri, working under both Shire and White.

But those chefs don't tell the whole story. Fast forward to the '90s, when a new crop of cooking talent arrived in Boston. Ken Oringer left San Francisco for the Back Bay, fame and fortune. Michael Schlow ditched New Jersey for the greener pastures of New England. Moving behind the scenes, we found Tony Maws at Oringer's Clio, while Dante de Magistris worked with Schlow at Café Louis.

Although incomplete (apologies to Harvest's Mary Dumont, Bokx 109's Evan Percoco, Bambara's Jay Silva, etc.), our tree gives you a good idea of the complex and curious nature of relations among restaurant folks. From little beginnings spring great culinary empires. In any number of kitchens right now, next year's celebrity chef could be quietly chopping onions.

The plate on the opposite page shows which Boston culinary figures have worked with each other, either as employers, executive chefs, or general potato-peelers. The more connections to a name, the bigger we've inflated the font (hence "Tony Maws" is as inflated as "Todd English"). We've tried to uncover as many links as possible. On this page, we serve up five big kahunas from the local dining scene, listing the many chefs who passed through their restaurants in trials by fire (and steam, grill, meat-hammer and possibly wood-fired oven).

BEACH BLANKET BLOODSHED

IT'S TOUGH ENOUGH being a teenage girl. But when you frequently have blackouts linked to mysterious deaths and go by the nickname Chicklet, you don't stand a chance. The Counter Productions Theatre Company and the Factory Theatre present Psycho Beach Party, the off-Broadway cult sensation and parody set in Malibu in the summer of '62. If you can't get enough '50s grindhouse horror flicks or '60s surfer films, then this show should float your boat.

Fired Up

Chicken Legs Summer may mean grill season, but backyards are scarce in Boston. Enter Chefs in Shorts. The annual event takes cooks out of their staunch uniforms and puts them in sportswear as they fire up the barbecue on the Boston Seaport on June 12. Bokx 109's Evan Percoco and Bambara's Jay Silva are just a few of the headliners who'll be slathering the sauce. There'll be all the fixings of a classic outdoors feast, minus bugs and stubborn lawn chairs. Proceeds benefit the Greater Boston Food Bank. Kyle Wright

Purple Prose

A Whole New Hue Whether you've seen the movie or just love Oprah Winfrey, this musical combines jazz, blues and gospel to tell The Color Purple in a fresh way. Based on Alice Walker's award-winning novel, the show follows a young girl through her trials and tribulations in the early 1900s. The play is brought to the stage by the Big O herself, and while you probably won't find keys to a free car under your seat, at least you'll leave with a few new songs stuck in your head. The Color Purple plays at the Citi Performing Arts Center's Wang Theatre June 16–28.

Angels & Demons ★ Are these Dan Brown books as stupid as the movies they've spawned? I guess you can call Angels & Demons a step up from 2006's unspeakably turgid The Da Vinci Code, if only because it's more frantic and unhinged than that burnished, lethargic yak-fest. This boondoggle begins with a time bomb full of anti-matter (yes, kids, "anti-matter") stashed somewhere in Vatican City, and things only get more preposterous from there. Late game developments in this picture provoked peals of laughter the likes of which I've seldom heard at comedies. I daresay it's Ron Howard's funniest film since Splash. Tom Hanks reprises his role as surly Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon, with his charisma tamped down flatter than his unfortunate hairstyle. He wanders around pointing at statues and mumbling obscure art history footnotes while everyone else marvels at his intellectual prowess. Howard cranks up the Gregorian chant and keeps the lighting dim and the mood glum, but the material's inherent silliness throws the ponderous self-seriousness into sharp comic relief. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Brothers Bloom ★★ ½ Despite fine performances and good intentions, writer/director Rian Johnson's sophomore effort suffers from a fatal case of the cutes. It does, however, earn credit for exploring the gray areas between good storytelling and bad grifting, wondering aloud whether sometimes the right kind of lie can be helpful, even therapeutic. Adrien Brody and Mark Ruffalo star as the titular siblings, working globetrotting con games full of obscure literary references and heavy symbolism. A bored, shut-in heiress (Rachel Weisz) could be either their latest mark or their newest partner, and the movie keeps you wondering for longer than perhaps necessary. The snazzy couture, snarky music cues, slow-motion interludes and widescreen compositions suggest that Johnson has been watching too many Wes Anderson flicks. For a movie so concerned with the space between illusion and reality, a more grounded, less whimsical approach would have sufficed. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Drag Me to Hell ★★★ Taking a breather from his Spider-Man tent poles, Sam Raimi returns to his Evil Dead roots with this high-spirited goof that's about as classy and sophisticated as the title would lead you to believe. Good sport Alison Lohman stars as a perky young banker who makes the mistake of denying a mortgage extension to a gypsy witch doctor. Faster than you can say "ancient curse," Raimi is off and running with dizzying corkscrew camera moves, shrieking sound effects and a cheerfully sophomoric procession of gross-outs. At times, Raimi, who penned the script with his brother Ivan, seems to be having a private contest to see how many icky fluids, flies and eyeballs he can land in Lohman's mouth. Lately, horror movies have become so downbeat and nasty that the exuberant showmanship here lends a pleasingly retro vibe. Drag Me has the cheeky, morality play spirit of Tales From the Crypt and an ending that's just about perfect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Duplicity ★★★ ½ Tony Gilroy's sophomore feature is so breezy with classic Hollywood charm, one might not even notice how cynical it is. Clive Owen stars as an MI6 sellout who ditched Her Majesty's secret service for a more lucrative career spying on frozen-pizza patent disputes. He's got a bad history with Julia Roberts' CIA bombshell, and Gilroy's film rather ingeniously eliminates any real-world stakes in setting these two working at cross-purposes for vainglorious lotion CEOs played by Tom Wilkinson and the amazing Paul Giamatti. Or are they up to something else entirely? Leapfrogging back and forth through time, Duplicity is a tricky, sophisticated affair that demands your undivided attention. The giddiness comes from the pleasure these actors take in Gilroy's dialogue, whether it's his rapid-fire banter or some juicy sidewinding monologues. Telling lies for a living takes a toll, and Duplicity asks: How do you love someone after you've discovered they're as full of crap as you are? (In the suburbs.)

Easy Virtue ★★ Director Stephan Elliott's supremely annoying version of Noël Coward's 1926 play feels like two hours of being poked in the ribs by somebody who desperately wants to make sure you understand just how funny everything is. Poor Jessica Biel flounders way

The Pixar hot streak continues.

Up
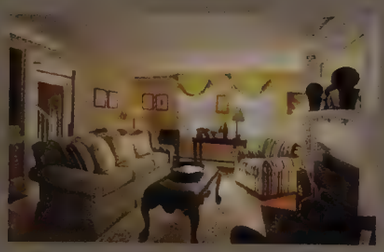
Starring Ed Asner, Jordan Nagai, Christopher Plummer and John Ratzenberger. Written by Pete Docter, Bob Peterson and Tom McCarthy. Directed by Docter and Peterson. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.



MY SISTER, WHO TENDS to be tougher than her overemotive big brother, called me last year after I demanded that she watch Wall-E. She was furious, shouting, "I can't believe I wound up crying during a freakin' cartoon about robots!" I can't wait until she sees Up.

By this point, people are probably sick of listening to critics gush about the genius of Pixar Animation Studios, but Pixar isn't just working on a level that puts its kiddie-flick competition to shame; it's got live-action

New England's Most Celebrated! Inn

The Bedford Village Inn earned its title "New England's Most Celebrated Inn" for its ambiance, outstanding service and sincere hospitality.

The Dining Rooms are the longest running Four Diamond restaurant in the state and feature Contemporary Regional New England Cuisine served in six unique dining rooms of this meticulously restored farm estate residence. Tucked away on the first floor is our newly expanded and redecorated Tavern serving a more casual menu. Perched on the second floor is our all new "Urban Chic" wine bar, Corks. With an imported Cruvinet, custom furnishings, artwork, oriental's, state-of-the-art fireplace, signature menu, wine blendings and complete bar, Corks is a whole new look for the Inn and the perfect spot to begin or end the evening.

The Inn rooms, also awarded Four Diamonds, were individually designed and decorated in the original barn and each one features a king-size , four-poster bed, sitting area, plasma screen TV, free high-speed internet and elegant Italian marble baths with whirlpool tubs. The Great Hall is the heart of the Inn and serves as New England's most sought after wedding reception venue.

The Federal architecture is elegantly complimented by miles of granite paths throughout the estate and native rock walls that highlight the manicured gardens filled with lush seasonal plantings and wisteria covered walkways. Come visit this genuine New England landmark where you'll find outstanding service and true New England hospitality.

TREASURES

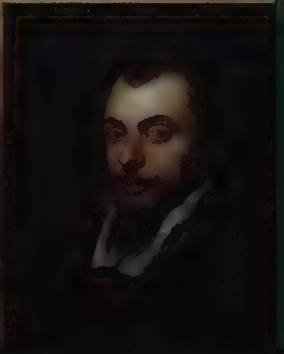
Summer Installation 2009

May 27 - August 28, 2009 • The Boston Athenæum

This summer, the Boston Athenæum exhibits treasures from its collection: paintings, sculptures, drawings, photographs, and manuscripts. Over 40 artists — American and European, from the 16th century to the present — are represented in the installation, adding to the wealth of objects already on public view on the Athenæum's first floor.

Since its founding in 1807, the Boston Athenæum has always collected a wide range of objects as well as books. This installation offers a rare chance to look closely at the treasures — both familiar favorites and seldom seen items — from the Athenæum's diverse collections.

The exhibition is free and open to the public.



Hours:
Monday: 9 a.m. - 8 p.m.
Tuesday - Friday: 9 a.m. - 5 p.m.

out of her league as a sophisticated American racecar driver who suffers the misfortune of marrying into a family of miserable English harpies. Kristin Scott Thomas costars as the brutal matriarch, trading insults with Colin Firth's depressed WWI veteran dad. Shrewish sisters Kimberley Nixon and Katherine Parkinson have plenty of put-downs of their own, while Biel's chinless hubby (Ben Barnes) simply shrugs and leaves her to the wolves. It's a shame that Elliott has no faith in the source material, as he constantly undercuts Coward's elegant prose with kooky camera angles and obnoxious, anachronistic soundtrack selections like "Car Wash." You end up wishing the movie would just leave you alone. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Every Little Step ★ ½ Reality television's worst tendencies have been steadily creeping into theatrical documentaries. This puzzlingly acclaimed feature purports to part the curtains and take us backstage for the recent Broadway revival of A Chorus Line, but the movie trivializes the entire process, treating the production like the season finale of Dancing With the Stars. After a bit of early, intriguing archival footage chronicling the late-night improvisation sessions from which the late Michael Bennett culled the original 1975 production, Every Little Step pirouettes straight into the auditions. Veteran choreographer Bob Avian serves as a toothless Simon Cowell, overseeing an open casting call of more than 3,000 aspiring young talents, but still finding time to preen for the camera with maximum disingenuousness. Instead of exploring artistic decisions, the film focuses on shallow, puff-piece "profiles" of contestants—oops, I mean aspiring young professionals—and elimination rounds ensue. You'll be scanning the screen for phone numbers and instructions on how to vote for your favorites. (At Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

The Girlfriend Experience ★★★ Only the director of Sex, Lies and Videotape would cast a porn star in a movie about the economy. Billing itself as a portrait of a high-priced call girl (Sasha Grey, making her legit movie debut), the latest from the prolific Steven Soderbergh offers little of prurient interest but plenty to gnaw on. Pointedly set last October, at the height of the presidential race and when the bottom fell out of our financial system, The Girlfriend Experience works best as a snapshot of Manhattan in the throes of panicked uncertainty. Working in fragmented rhythms calling to mind 1960s Godard, Soderbergh depicts Grey's savvy escort as a blank slate, all the better to indict a New York culture in which every human interaction is just a business transaction. It's a cold picture that's deliberately slippery and unresolved. At times the movie feels as aloof as Grey's untrained lack of affect, but good luck getting it off your mind. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Monsters Vs. Aliens ★★★ Like a snarky little offshoot of Pixar's crew of bona fide artistes, DreamWorks Animation tends to specialize in pop-culture references and dated inside jokes aimed at the long-suffering parents in the audience. Its latest endeavor will never be confused with Wall-E, but at least it's a cohesive piece that boasts a charmingly 50s' retro sensibility and some dazzling 3-D effects. Reese

Hollywood licked, too. The best film I've seen so far this year, Up is a wildly funny, surreal adventure story grounded in a deeply felt sense of loss. Thematically sophisticated and casually profound, the movie had me bawling within the first 10 minutes.

With incredible economy, tenderness and barely a word of dialogue, Up compresses a lifelong love story into the first half reel. We meet our hero, Carl Fredricksen, when he's just a wee lad, falling hard for the tomboy next door, Ellie. In a beautiful montage, we watch the next 70 years play out as a procession of precious memories and life's little disappointments. Then Ellie dies, leaving the septuagenarian Carl alone in their ramshackle home, the rest of the neighborhood bulldozed by strip mall developers.

The opening sequence is so powerful, Carl's desolation so palpable, that it sounds crazy to say he then outfits his house with 10,000 helium balloons and flies to South America, but that's exactly what happens. He's haunted by Ellie's never-realized dream of exploring an exotic land called Paradise Falls, so now, with nothing left to lose, he figures he'll finally bring her there, at least in spirit.

One catch: There's a stowaway on the front porch. Portly young Russell is an eager-beaver Boy Scout looking to earn his "elderly assistance merit badge," and much to curmudgeonly Carl's dismay, he's now angling for sidekick status. We only slowly become aware of Russell's own abandonment issues, but it's pretty clear from the get-go that the kid needs a father figure. Any bets as to whether or not this pudgy half-pint thaws Carl's cold heart?

A miraculous balancing act, Up only gets wilder and weirder as the house soars to Venezuela. Somehow the movie manages to include a 13-foot female bird named Kevin, an army of talking dogs and some spectacular action sequences while never losing sight of the human drama. Carl and Russell's adventures may be fantastical, but their emotions are painfully true.

Even the character design is a bit looser and more daring than previous Pixar features. Just looking at our two heroes is funny, as Carl seems to be comprised of mainly right angles while Russell is shaped more like an egg. But Up's real stroke of genius arrives with the dogs.

> The movie had me bawling within the first 10 minutes.

Leave it to Pixar to find a novel way around the old talking-animal cliché. These particular puppies have been outfitted with high-tech collars that translate their thoughts into English. (Other languages are optional, we learn later.) Thus, in crisp, eloquent diction devoid of contractions, we're treated to some hysterical streams of canine consciousness, complete with ardent declarations of unconditional love for their human masters and a pathological hatred of squirrels.

Breathtakingly animated, Up has more strange and beautiful images than can possibly be listed here, and yet my mind keeps returning to that house, born aloft by thousands of brilliantly colored balloons. It's a ridiculous conceit that pays rich metaphorical dividends. For all the odd, exotic creatures and rousing action sequences, this is still an interior journey, as Carl must learn to let go of Ellie and begin living his life again. Their home holds 70 years of history, but once the helium starts to leak, the weight of the past literally becomes too heavy to hang onto anymore.

It's that kind of insight and artful visualization of theme—never belabored but always present—that makes Up such a wonder to behold. ✖✖✖

Magnolia Pictures

Witherspoon voices an unlucky bride struck by a meteorite, now horrified to find herself growing seven stories tall and quarantined in a secret government facility with a bunch of icky monsters. Once aliens attack, these outcasts become America's last line of defense. There's some very funny voice work by Hugh Laurie as the world's smartest cockroach, while Seth Rogen is typecast as an amorphous, dimwitted blob. As was bound to happen sooner or later, Stephen Colbert plays the president. See the IMAX 3-D presentation, which distracts from any screenwriting weaknesses with a healthy dose of eye candy. (In the suburbs.)

The Soloist ★★ Robert Downey Jr. stars as L.A. Times columnist Steve Lopez, a motor-mouthed depressive who befriends a homeless, schizophrenic musical prodigy, played by Jamie Foxx.

Shady Business

Up Close and Personal

Porn star Sasha Grey makes her legit movie debut in Steven Soderbergh's The Girlfriend Experience.

Lopez writes an inexplicably popular series of columns, congratulating himself for befriending Foxx's babbling musician. This scores him a book deal and some journalism awards, but poor Foxx is still out on the street, mumbling to himself and playing Beethoven on a broken violin. Susannah Grant's screenplay spends a moment or two wondering how much of this "friendship" is really opportunistic exploitation on Lopez's part, but the movie is too cowardly to stay there for very long. The Soloist moves about in a muddle, never quite sure of what story it's supposed to be telling. Flashbacks to Foxx's traumatic childhood and mental breakdown are interlaced with mundane details about Downey's broken marriage, until it becomes one of those movies where the minority figure's tragic fall is just another way for the callous white guy to learn important life lessons. (Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Star Trek ★★★ ½ What a wonderful surprise. It takes serious gall to recast characters as iconic as Captain Kirk and Mr. Spock with fresh-faced barely-knowns. Sure, there's a shiny coat of CGI paint and everybody's impossibly good-looking, but director JJ Abrams has captured the upbeat sense of adventure that defined Gene Roddenberry's original 1960s' series. More so than any Trek project in decades, this one captures the camaraderie, the easy humor and, most important, the swagger that we associate with the headstrong Kirk and his logical, pointy-eared pal. Much like Casino Royale, Abrams' Star Trek finds ingenious ways to serve up familiar pleasures. Rare for a landscape dominated by dour popcorn blockbusters, this one isn't afraid to be fun. All the phaser battles, sexy green girls and transporter beam antics you'd expect are present, just with slightly unexpected spins. The film's rousing finale ends with the Enterprise crew at last assembled and warping off to what we can only hope will be a happy series of sequels. May they live long and prosper. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Ocean's Infinity

Waterlogged

In Finding Nemo, Ellen Degeneres brought the star-factor to a film about fish. Not to be outdone is Deep Sea, a marine-life documentary narrated by A-listers Johnny Depp and Kate Winslet. Last paired together in Never Land, Depp and Winslet take another trip to a faraway place in this exploration of the surprising relationships between undersea creatures. The movie runs at the Museum of Science beginning June 19.

State of Play ★★ ½ Russell Crowe's goofy, game performance is the best reason to see this so-so Beltway thriller, which was awkwardly condensed from a six-hour BBC miniseries by director Kevin Macdonald. Crowe stars as a scruffy, hard-drinking reporter for a struggling D.C. daily, and he has a grand time selling the more preposterous aspects of the picture. It seems the mistress of Ben Affleck's rising-star congressman committed suicide, or was she perhaps murdered by a Blackwater-esque corporation Affleck's investigating? The film cruises along at an agreeable pace, piling on a few unsurprising plot twists and developments with the brisk efficiency of an airport paperback. Will anybody really wonder if this mess is going to somehow involve that homeless guy we saw executed over a mysterious briefcase during the opening credits? Or what about when an actor as famous as Jeff Daniels is hanging around in background without much to do for an hour? Do you think he might be involved? (In the suburbs.)

Sugar ★★★ ½ Gorgeous and understated, the latest film from Half Nelson writer/directors Anna Boden and Ryan Fleck follows Miguel "Sugar" Santos (Algenis Perez Soto), a promising pitcher from the Dominican Republic who finds himself ground in the gears of Major League Baseball's recruiting system. Avoiding what we've come to expect from a typical sports movie, Sugar has no interest in clichéd climaxes like a ninth-inning strikeout. It's a film about the day-to-day mechanics of a sports industry and what it feels like to be an outsider in America. With a tenuous grasp on the English language, Sugar and his teammates find themselves dropped in a small baseball-crazy town in Iowa, and the inevitable culture clash is rendered with uncommon sensitivity. In fact, my one quibble with Sugar is that the film may be a bit too sensitive. This is such a gentle, compassionate picture, a little crassness may have given it more dramatic punch. But how often does one complain that a movie is too thoughtful? (At Somerville Theatre.)

Terminator Salvation ★ At least now we know why Christian Bale was so angry. A scant 25 years after James Cameron's low-budget thriller made a superstar out of California's future governor, a hack director who preposterously insists on calling himself McG has at last run the franchise into the ground. Bale barks a single, repetitive note as John Connor, humanity's humorless savior, who, thanks to time travel's pretzel logic, must rescue his teenage father (Anton Yelchin) from a lot of noisy, clanking robots and some patently offensive Holocaust allusions. There's also much ado about a befuddled cyborg, blandly played by Sam Worthington, who seems as confused as we are as to what purpose his character serves. Lacking a clear antagonist or any discernable reason to exist, Terminator Salvation suffers from a parched, ugly color palette and offers no relief from the grim funeral tone. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

X-Men Origins: Wolverine ★ After an acrimonious split with series director Bryan Singer following 2003's nifty X2: X-Men United, 20th Century Fox seemed lost on how to proceed with their superhero franchise. First X3: The Last Stand scrapped Singer's carefully developed allegories of alienation and killed off the most interesting characters, and now Wolverine seeks to demystify the tragic history of Hugh Jackman's cigar-chomping scene-stealer. As far as revelations go, the movie doesn't offer much that wasn't already covered in X2. The only surprises here are the dour mood, shoddy special effects and complete absence of levity. Directed by Gavin Hood, who recently helmed the rancid war on terror melodrama Rendition, Wolverine takes itself remarkably seriously for a movie about a man with knives coming out of his knuckles. It's a somber affair, and Jackman is forced to tamp down the character's roguish Han Solo charms in favor of a lot of brooding, scowling and howling upward into clichéd overhead shots. No more of these, please. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

MOUNTAIN MAN

BRETT DENNEN loves to play outdoors, and he's doing a lot of it this summer, appearing at festivals from Bonnaroo to Newport. But for several years, as a teenager and beyond, the gangly redhead played to his first outdoor audiences around the campfire at Northern California summer camps.

"That's how I learned to play the guitar and fell in love with the idea of performing," says the 29-year-old singer, who appears at the free Life Is Good Festival on Boston Common June 20. "And it's something that I keep with me when I perform now, to try and create that sort of atmosphere."

That has grown a bit tougher as a rising star who has been charming larger and larger crowds with his melodic folk-pop groove, crisp finger-picking and optimistic tone. "What has changed the most is every day I can be forced to believe in myself in ways I never knew," Dennen says. "What's changed the least is probably my humor.... I'm still kinda clumsy and goofy and foolish, and I have a dirty mouth."

The dirty mouth may come as a surprise, given the wholesome veneer of his third CD. Hope for the Hopeless was produced by John Alagia, who helmed similar breakout discs for Dave Matthews and John Mayer. Dennen mines territory comparable to those artists, with an extra nod to the soulful style of early Van Morrison in "Wrong About Me." He writes tunes that are often breezy and simply crafted to perfection.

In turn, Hope for the Hopeless includes its share of love songs. Yet Dennen also has a socially conscious perspective. "Heaven" mulls salvation from earthly woes and lends the album's title phrase. And "Make You Crazy" (with Afro-pop star Femi Kuti on backing vocals) is so pleasantly ubiquitous that listeners might not even notice its verse decrying wrongful imprisonments and child soldiers.

"I've definitely made an effort to have it be really catchy, so even if people don't want to hear the message, they're still going to," Dennen says from a tour stop in the Netherlands. "More artists should speak their minds, speak their heart."

Social causes are close to Dennen's heart. He majored in community studies and social change in college, and engaged in nonprofit work like the Mosaic Project, where fifth graders from diverse socioeconomic backgrounds attend outdoor camp. "They wouldn't normally get the chance to mingle because of various levels of segregation," says the singer, who has also taught middle school, tutored autistic youths and worked as a carpenter. "It's building community across differences, a community that celebrates differences.

"If you go out in the wilderness, everything is a metaphor for your life," continues Dennen, who still serves on the Mosaic Project's board of directors and recorded songs that are incorporated into the curriculum. "There's an important quote that I always say: 'It's not the top or the bottom of the mountain that sustains life. It's the sides of the mountain. It's the progress of getting to the top.'"

> "It's not the top or the bottom of the mountain that sustains life. It's the sides of the mountain. It's the progress."

Dennen is busy these days on the side of the mountain known as the music business. The onetime coffeehouse performer will play the Newport Folk Festival Aug. 1, then open for O.A.R. at the Bank of America Pavilion Aug. 13 and 14.

But first Dennen will join the Blind Boys of Alabama and SteveSongs for the Life Is Good Festival. The sponsoring Boston apparel company will be channeling its merchandise proceeds and onsite donations to Project Joy, which promotes cooperative play for abused children.

And if anyone goes barefoot on the Common, it'll be Dennen. In a video for "Make You Crazy," he plays a barefooted shoe salesman who charms customer Mandy Moore, a role that has footing in his real life. "It's just more comfortable for me to stand and play barefoot," he says. "I wiggle my toes and dance around." ✖✖✖

Easy Sitter

Flying Solo To say Andrew Bird keeps himself busy would be an understatement. Besides releasing his fifth solo record, Noble Beast (the fourth in just under six years), Bird has recorded appearances on 45 albums in his 13-year career. Boasting proficiency in violin, guitar, mandolin, glockenspiel and even the lost art of musical whistling, it's no surprise he's so in demand. Bird's records are filled with lush, multilayered folk storytelling. In addition to summer stops at the Bonnaroo, Lollapalooza and Austin City Limits music festivals, Bird is at the Bank of America Pavilion on June 19, where he'll showcase the virtuosic talents that have caught the eye of everyone from Ani DiFranco to the Squirrel Nut Zippers. Max Gelber

Chances Are You've Been Sitting on a Cure for Cancer

Before Lance, even before LeMond, there was the PMC, a 190-mile bike-a-thon that brought cycling to the American consciousness. Since 1980, the PMC has raised almost $240 million for cancer research. Today, 100 percent of every rider-raised dollar goes directly to that cause.

PMC 2009 – August 1 & 2 – 6,000 cyclists from 36 states and 6 countries will ride. Last year, the PMC raised $35 million for cancer research at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute. Are you ready to take the Pan-Mass Challenge?

Edited by Nick Altschuller

Boy Genius

Map Quest Author Reif Larson's novel, The Selected Works of T.S. Spivet, follows the adventures of a 12-year-old cartographer who does more than hang his doodles on the fridge. His leisurely illustrations, reviewed by the Smithsonian, earn him the prestigious Baird Award, and so he embarks on a cross-country journey to deliver his acceptance speech (age unknown to the Institute). On the way he meets peculiar people and uncovers his secret family history. Larson presents his prodigy on June 11 at Harvard Book Store.

IMPROPER Sightings!

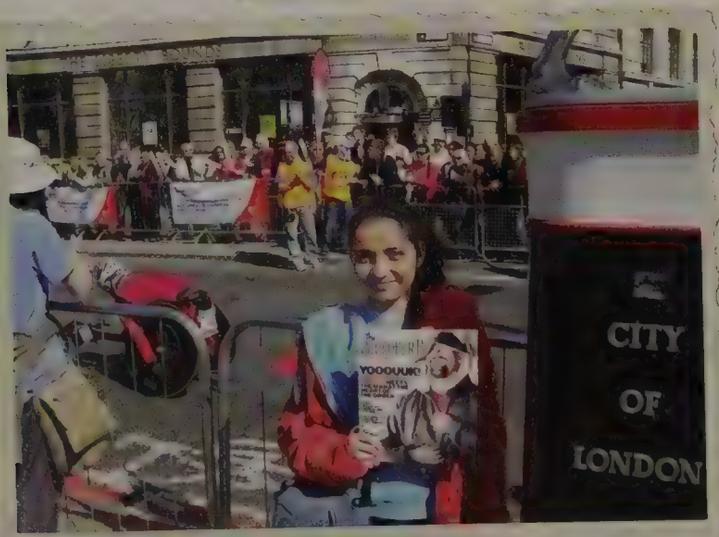
ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER RACING HILARY SWANK AT THE "MAN VS. HORSE" MARATHON, HELD JUNE 13 IN LLANWRTYD WELLS, WALES.



Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Down in Cabo, Blair Lesser and Jonathan Sullivan went whale-watching on the Sea of Cortez. Although they may have been better off watching out for swine flu.

While at Utah's Snowbird Ski Resort, Neil Cohen tracked down 7'4" former Jazz center Mark Eaton. Although he's now 52, Eaton would still be better than Mikki Moore. Even wearing skis.

Young Zoe Israel brought us across the pond for the 28th annual London Marathon. We finished second in the magazine division, just behind THE IMPROPER KENYAN.

U.S. Senator Mike Crapo (R-Idaho) suppressed the pain of years of torturous elementary school roll calls, just long enough to flash us a smile.

New Math

It was refreshing to see that the only ones in tuxes at the United Way's Young Leaders Cocktails and Starfish Gala, held at the New England Aquarium, were the penguins and the band.

Speaking of which, the latter was Four Guys In Tuxes, and yet strangely enough, that night they were a trio.

When questioned about it, the group's leader laughed and said, "Sometimes we're a quintet, and at some parties, we're Four Guys in Tuxes, the 10-piece orchestra."

Here's Five Bucks: Go Buy Yourself Some Perspective

Anyone who says they weren't choked up is a liar—if you were at the Perkins Possibilities Gala, held at the Watertown School for the Blind, you got at least a little misty when special guests Natalie Merchant and Livingston Taylor performed "Wonder" with a student choir.

The annual gala dinner attracted the usual suspects, among them: the first couple of the NBA, Wyc and Corrine Grousbeck, the impossibly attractive Beth Dickerson and David Drubner, gay divorcee (but not in the lesbian sense) Beth Weir, concessions gazillionaire Joe O'Donnell, Idaho-bred anchor babe Lisa Hughes, attorney-at-large Derek Davis and one guest who said to someone who was shouting in his ear, "It's Perkins School for the Blind, not the deaf."

However, the most amusing exchange came when one man said, "I can't believe I need reading glasses to see this," to which his friend replied, "If you're complaining about reading glasses at the Perkins School for the Blind, things are pretty good."

Don't Play With Your Food

How often do you get to leave a party with an industrial-sized potato masher, a set of tea towels or a kitchen implement that looks like it should be sold in a sex shop?

That was just part of the charm of The Heart Ball, held at the Westin Copley, to benefit the American Heart Association.

The evening's theme—"Home is Where the Heart Is"—had the tables decorated with assorted cooking utensils that were there for the grabbing. There for the gabbing were such interesting and glamorous types as Elan and Adrianna Sassoon (as in "mahvelous" hair), financial titan Ernest Jacquet and the beguiling Susan Lutes, the ubiquitous Hat Sisters, cardiologists to the stars Ken Rosenfield and Larry Cohn, the latter's art-collector wife, Roberta, and others of an equally glittery ilk.

Following cocktails and dinner, guests headed up a flight of stairs and through a curtain to the dance floor, where the band kept the stalwarts boogeying into the wee hours, although some of us took the theme to heart and went home.

Memo to the person who painted a heart in red wine on one of the cocktail tables: that was super creative, but remind me never to invite you to a benefit for Crohn's and Colitis Disease.

Here's to the Ladies Who Lunch

For most of us, Party in the Park conjures up adolescent memories of furtive underage beer drinking and smoking clandestine joints while keeping an eye out for the cops. For the city's most high-powered women, it means an elegant luncheon in The Fens, in a tent decorated to a fare-thee-well with lilacs and peonies, to raise money for the Emerald Necklace Conservancy. It also means some extreme air-kissing, since everyone wears a hat, and getting too close can mean a pheasant feather in the eye (I was careful and still ended up with abrasions).

And yet, there isn't anyone there you wouldn't want to kiss, among them: event chairs Janet Atkins, Lynn Dale and Jane Roy, vice-chairs Molly Dunne and Jeannette Hsu-McSweeney, and just about every other bold-faced XX chromosome in the city, including the soignee Khaki Austin, fashionista Katie Schuller Bleakie, the diamond-bedecked Anne Fitzpatrick Cucchiaro, latter-day Warhol girls Kristina Lyons and Marina Kalb, and so on down the list of the women who run this town.

Hermès customized a gorgeous scarf that went for $375 and came in two accent colors (orange ended up beating yellow), the food was spa-cuisine but satisfying and anyone who felt like it (and quite a few did) could catch a buzz off the plentiful white wine.

The afternoon's most amusing remark: Kitty Dukakis, accepting (alongside her husband) the Justine Mee Liff Spirit Award, said of the former governor: "I used to refer to my husband as the tightest man in America. I can't do that anymore because he just bought me an Hermès scarf." ×××

Gratuitous Nudity

A hairy man, back fat billowing over faded boxers, reclines on a chaise lounge. Not your idea of hot? Ours neither. But it sure makes us giggle. So for our annual Sex & Love issue, we ditched the roses and Champagne in favor of five funny "bunnies." That's the group of local comics who agreed to pose as pin-ups and reveal their naughty sides. If that scares you, well, it should. Let's just say Tony V's turnoffs include "16 things that are not vaginas."

Keeping with the theme, we photographed comedian Eugene Mirman for the cover. Mirman is well-known in online circles for his sexpert bit (see it on YouTube but close your office door first). His 2009 book, The Will to Whatevs: A Guide to Modern Life, doles out self-help advice, including how to "become ultra-popular in high school (without 'putting out')." Like this issue, it's best read for laughs.

PHALLUS PRETENSES

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE the market for a high-quality penis cake. That's one of the life lessons learned by Niki Novak, founder, owner, baker and chocolatier at Sweet-N-Nasty, the Back Bay's famed erotic bakery.

"We make them delicious," says Novak, 48, who opened the store in 1982 after having eaten a disappointing erotic cake in New York City. "This was when penis cakes were still PC," she laughs. "It was expensive; it didn't taste great." Although Novak had never baked so much as a brownie, she thought that with Boston's large student and gay populations she could turn a profit on scandalous desserts that actually tasted good.

"We started designing a basic 100 molds," she says. "You'd be surprised by all the positions and body parts. Now we have 500 patented ones." Twice a week, her staff—many of whom are former art students—melts Mercken's chocolate into shapes tailored for bachelorette parties, birthdays, even vasectomies. "Cupcakes are huge now," Novak says. "That's why I'm at the gym six times a week."

Novak bristles at the suggestion that her confections are sexist. Her store is woman-owned, women-operated and serves a clientele that's more than half female. Besides, it's hard to see a chocolate boob as anything but a joke.

"As long as people walk around with clothes on," Novak laughs, "this is going to be funny."

Drink of the Moment

Tough Love

"Venus in Furs" is a painting by Titian (now on display at the MFA), a sleepy, seductive song from the Velvet Underground and a lusty novella by Leopold von Sacher-Masoch. The works are sexy, but seeing them as romantic may depend on your inclinations (Masoch being the root of the word "masochism"). The book, according to UpStairs on the Square bar manager Augusto Lino, is "a love story, but a really f'ed-up one."

So the name is appropriate for a fizzy vermillion drink both alluring and a little rough around the edges. Based on the Seelbach Cocktail created in the early 1900s, the Venus in Furs ($12) mixes bourbon, Cointreau, lemon juice, honey, Champagne and Peychaud's bitters. "The 21st-century palate is a little more sweet/sour, whereas before it was more bitter/sweet, so I just brought it to [this] century," says Lino, describing his method and the current cocktail spirit where "everything old is new."

With a layer of foam providing the "fur," the drink's dainty shade and sweet, floral nose disguises a bourbon kick and a dry, bitter finish. In keeping with the theme, Lino describes the flavor as somewhere "between hard-core and missionary." So while the origin stems from finding pleasure in pain, the Venus in Furs aims to please, no matter what your taste.

Good Eats

In the Raw

Boston's Japanese fish houses get plenty of praise, but barely a fin's been flapped in the direction of South America—let alone our East Boston equivalent. That's too bad, because Rincon Limeño's Peruvian ceviche showcases some seriously fresh catch. Almost every plate emerging from the kitchen at the tidy Day Square eatery holds fried or citrus-cured seafood. Try the combo platter, which mixes lemon-juiced cubes of pristine monkfish, whole shrimp and squid. The dish also includes hunks of white and sweet potatoes, cilantro and toasted corn kernels.

ASK THE EXPERT

SEX MYTHS: TRUE OR FALSE

DAN POLLETS LICENSED SEX THERAPIST

Drinking pineapple juice makes sperm taste better.
True. Pineapple juice is a good way to make your semen sweeter. Citrus fruits and cranberry juice are also very good, as they make the body's pH more acidic, which helps to counteract the alkalinity of semen giving it its salty, bleach taste.

Coca-Cola is an effective spermicide.
False. Coke is not an effective spermicide. It will help take unwanted rust off your '57 Chevy and add to weight gain if ingested in large amounts.

You can't get pregnant if you have sex in certain positions like having the woman on top.
False. You can get pregnant having unprotected sex in any position where a penis finds its way to a vagina and ejaculation occurs. It doesn't even need to be intromitted for those sneaky and relentless sperm to find their way to nirvana. Use birth control!

Using two condoms is better than one.
False. Using two condoms might add some protection but the loss of sensation makes it a losing proposition—akin to donning two raincoats to take a shower.

Only women can have multiple orgasms.
True. Men need to reload. The older the man, the longer it takes to reload. God's way of compensating women for the pain of childbirth is to equip them with the capacity to have multiple orgasms.

Message in a Bottle

There's about as much variety in the kind of wine you love as in anything that stirs strong emotions. Ultimately, it's very personal. Distinctiveness turns me on: wine with unexpected flavor thrills, maybe some imperfection, tasting like it can't be reproduced elsewhere. I also find a velvety texture irresistible. And these days, value is universally appealing. The following three suggestions seduce the palate with affordable style.

Momo Sauvignon Blanc Marlborough, New Zealand, 2008 ($15, Blanchard's, Jamaica Plain). This baby has all the brash freshness of a lip-smacking New Zealand sauvignon blanc, but it whispers rather than shouts. I've always believed that unless sauvignon blanc is a little extreme, it's not worth doing. But this one proves me wrong. It's got layers upon layers, and what's underneath is that beautiful citrus purity that defines the varietal. Yum!

Tierra Divina Malbec Valle de Uco, Argentina, 2006 ($12, Wine Emporium, Boston). Produced 3,000-plus feet up in the Andes, this is for chocolate addicts. It's got all kinds of vanilla, caramel and sweet-smoky luscious flavors that might seem like too much of a good thing if it weren't for the abundance of black plum, cinnamon and red-berry jam notes. In short, it's a meal in a glass, with an extra helping of dessert.

Trevor Jones "Virgin" Chardonnay Southeast Australia, 2007 ($15.50, Vino Divino, Newton). Smooth and creamy, this one's got an abundance of white peach and spring apple, with a silky mouthfeel. It's for people who profess not to like chardonnay, or those who think Australia is all about oak chips and honey. Why "virgin?" It's untouched by wood of any kind. This demonstrates what Southeast Australia can create if you keep the tonnage down and build low-yield intensity so the chardonnay expresses its real character.

HIP TO BE SQUARE

When you walk into the Friendly Toast in Kendall Square, your hipster warning alarms might go off. The staff is appropriately funky and tattooed, and the ambience suggests Pee-Wee's Playhouse redecorated by the B-52's. So you might be tempted to think that it's all affected pretense. A Bennigan's gone through the looking glass.

But doubts vanish with the appearance of owner Melissa Jasper, 41, who sidles up to a bar she topped with Wacky Pack cards and mahjong tiles. She says that her own home is designed in the same manner. "She's got a knack for decorating," explains GM Mike Hartin. "Or horrible taste," Jasper counters.

The original Friendly Toast opened 15 years ago in Dover, N.H., where Jasper "started with $7,000, and [has] been underfinanced ever since." A move to Portsmouth was followed by an expansion into Cambridge last month. Local fans tired of making the hour-long weekend drive now have Almond Joy pancakes ($7.50) at the ready, along with new items for a new neighborhood, like the Ole Miss ($10)—cayenne cheddar toast with sausage (real or veg), mashed chipotle sweet potatoes, scrambled eggs and mango sour cream.

And does Jasper have a favorite? "I do, but recommending it is always a guarantee that people won't get it, because it's the weirdest thing on the menu." A gooey melt of house-made oatmeal bread stuffed with dill pickles, cheddar, plum tomatoes, Dijon mustard and horseradish mayo, the Mr. Haegar ($8.95) is reminiscent of the diner itself—offbeat at first, but ultimately harmonious.

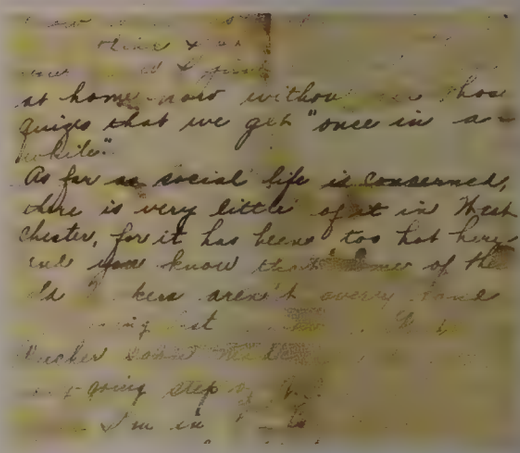
STATE OF THE UNION

The marriage and correspondence of John and Abigail Adams

THE HBO SERIES John Adams forever imprints the darkly shambling Paul Giamatti as the second president and Laura Linney as his serious, steadfast Abigail. Serving as a delegate to the Continental Congress and ambassador to England and France, John left Abigail to tend the children and the farm in Braintree, Mass. Edith Gelles' biography weaves together this history-telling with their extraordinary letters.



With the couple apart for most of 10 years, but for impregnating visits, these literary lifelines were burstingly affectionate, gorgeously expressive. Eighteenth-century Nouns were written in Capital Letters conveying a Tone of high Declaration! Politics, slavery, family matters, tragedies crossed the ocean on paper, binding them through enormous world events. (Speaking of worldliness: When John brought his puritanical wife to Paris, she was shocked by the ooh-la-la of it all.) While away, he wrote, "Is there no Way for two friendly Souls to converse together, although the Bodies are 400 miles off? Yes, by Letter. But I want a better Communication. I want to hear you think, or see your Thoughts."

And Abigail: "I have held you to my Bosom till my whole Soul has dissolved in Tenderness and my pen fallen from my Hand." Pithy e-mailers, take note. ×××

RUNNING OF THE MOUTHS

TO THE TWO WOMEN SITTING BEHIND US (SECTION 15, ROW NN): Thanks for ruining the Dave Matthews concert Saturday night. You had a loud conversation from the second you got there through the encore. The only break we got from your nonstop chatting was when one of you went to get a beer. Then you just kept talking louder! Did you bother to stop and listen to one song? Next time, just stay in your car and put on a CD and let the rest of us enjoy the show. You two couldn't have been more annoying. No wonder both of you were dateless on a Saturday night!

Anonymous

To the Impersonals:

I read the Impersonal by your whiny, entitled reader "Anonymous" who wanted another passenger's aisle seat on a recent flight, because she had a cold and "got bad news" before boarding, and she really wanted to sit next to her husband on the flight. Boo hoo! [News] flash for her: They should have reserved earlier. I wouldn't have given up my aisle seat, either. And her husband was probably grateful he didn't have to listen to her the whole flight. Tell her to grow up and stop whining!

To My Fellow Commuter Rail Passengers:

When you walk on the train and the car is quiet, take a seat, take a hint and keep your mouth shut. We're either sleeping, reading or zoning out, and we'd prefer not to listen to your inane chatter. Believe it or not, we're not fascinated with your mundane life. We don't want to hear your dumbass conversation about what you did last weekend, what you're doing this weekend, how your kid is doing in baseball, or what a jerk your boyfriend is. It doesn't matter if you're on your cell phone or talking to a fellow commuter; you're in a public space. Have consideration for others and wait until you're off the train.

LOST IN TRANSLATION

Nick ruins your reputation.

HOW WOULD you describe yourself? No question packs more pressure per column inch. After you've stalled with the basics like age and alma mater, it's difficult to come up with an honest answer beyond, "I'm the type of person who hates you for asking."

Defining yourself as a Bostonian is even harder. It's like saying you live in the year 2009. Like time, place shapes your character in ways impossible to accurately quantify. But that's what I had to do.

A French travel program, Échappées Belles, e-mailed the office looking to learn about—and shoot a day in the life of—"the true Bostonian." It took some badgering, but after making sure it wasn't a prank show, I agreed. So a month later, two French women knocked on my door, ready to witness the supernova of titillation that is my Bostonian life… at 8 am… on a Monday. You know, when the city is just alive with possibilities.

Right away we started with a small lie, and the pressure to honestly represent all of you lessened a bit. In front of a camera the size of a RPG-7, I lazed on the couch watching SportsCenter, as men regardless of locale are wont to do, when the interviewer asked me about the Red Sox (i.e., the prism through which the entire world now sees Bostonians.) I explained that sure, I like the team, but after years of intense fandom, I was finding it harder to stoke my enthusiasm. But I was missing the point. What she wanted was a shot of me watching the Sox. So I flipped to the previous game's replay, a mind-numbing spectacle that most fans don't watch and, in the Internet age, is pretty useless. It's like watching a History Channel special on what your mom had for lunch. Evidently, I was just there to give them all I could offer, and they'd spackle in the rest.

Next was a short tour around my neighborhood, where we settled in the Paul Revere mall as I desperately tried to sound intelligent by explaining Revere's disproportionate amount of fame, and other topics I had Wikipedia'd the day before. Unfortunately, they bought it and asked me about the plaques on the walls, leaving me to stammer my way through the history of Sam Adams and… that other guy. Seen through the eyes of a tourist, I guess we do play up the Revolutionary War connection. So I suppose the question of whether we still hate the British was understandable. "There's no animosity, besides them being bad tippers," I explained, before adding, "but apparently we saved YOUR asses in World War II." I was on fire.

From there it was a walk through the Common, where I was forced to admit I didn't know how George Washington died, and we got some lovely footage of a terrier taking a dump. At The Improper office, the conversation turned to, "Who is the typical Bostonian?" (I guess I wasn't filling the bill.) I explained that ideally we're a hardworking and intellectually curious people exceedingly proud of our past, and both in love with, and sometimes frustrated by, our current cultural standing. We know we're not the biggest, but we'll take on all comers. And the sweat we put into our pursuits is often tempered by beer. (I may have started projecting.)

Appropriately enough, our afternoon stop was Drink, where I sipped on a cocktail named after a fictional French whore and loosened up enough to start bragging. We have a lot to be proud of, from our stance on marijuana to our legalization of gay marriage. As the hubris and alcohol went to my head, I relaxed enough to hit the men's room without turning my mike off.

The day ended on the Charles at Restaurant Dante, which provided a beatific visual ending and fitting analogy. Obviously Boston isn't the inferno, but it can be hellish to play tour guide, let alone to be asked to represent your people. But I pulled no punches in detailing our greatness, which I think any local would do. Because although I don't define myself as a true Bostonian, I'm proud to play one on TV. ✖✖✖

Toothpaste & Tikka

When is a corner store not just another corner store? When it enhances its (rather paltry) selection of drugstore goods with a multi-ethnic kitchen. To be honest, any place that advertises pupusas, samosas and a slew of Italian-American staples sounds a bit like a shopping-mall food court. But locals can't say enough about the convenience—and the crisp-crusted pizzas, chicken tikka, steak bombs and Buffalo wings—at this atypical melting pot.

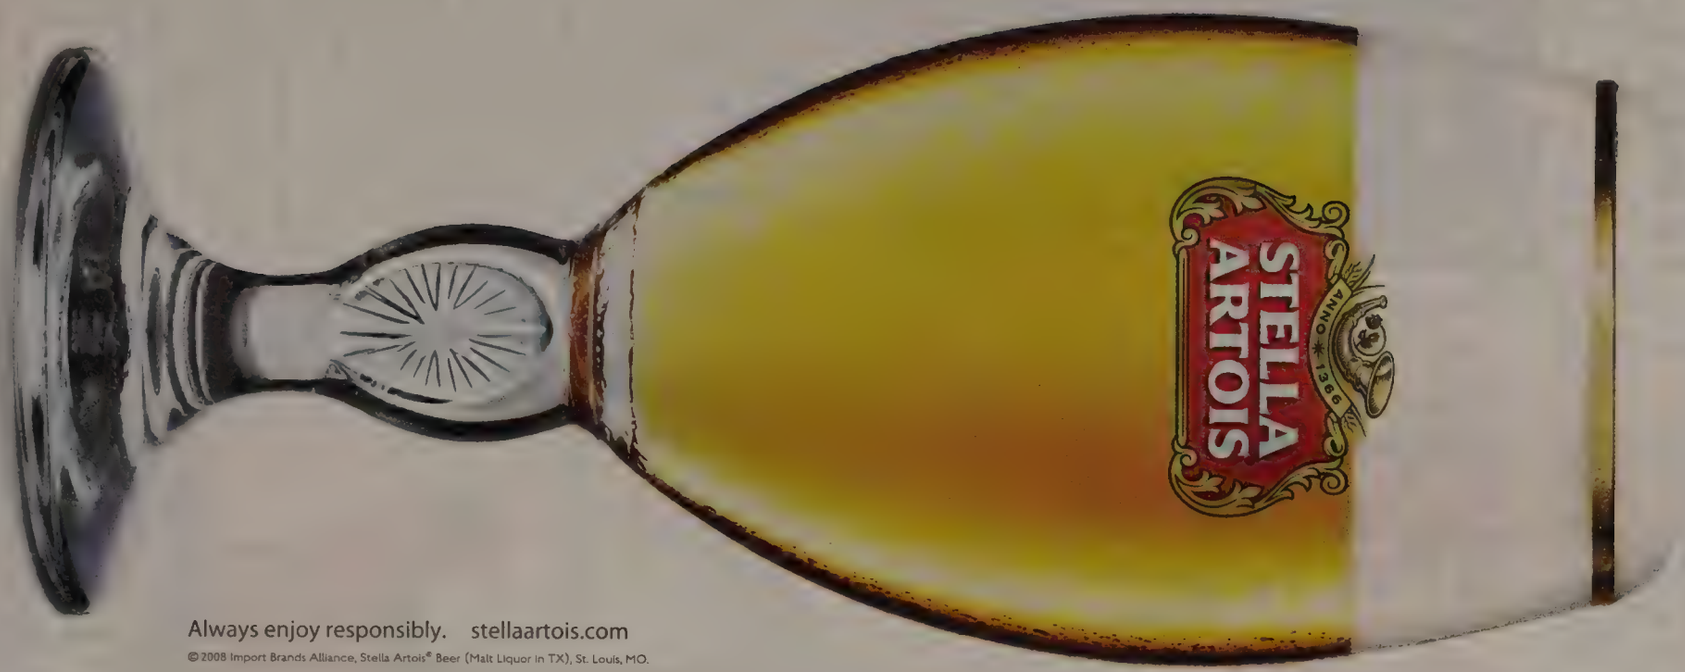
SQUAB OUT OF A JOB?

Bina Osteria revamps.

IF YOUR GLASS IS half-empty, you'll wallow in wistfulness over the gnocchi, carbonara and squab dishes that departed from Bina Osteria with their creator, chef Brian Konefal. If you're the half-full type, you'll be happy to hear that co-proprietor Azita Bina-Seibel is heading up the kitchen.

About eight months after opening with an upscale splash, Bina now offers moderately-priced bar and patio menus. We're not talking downscale here. New items include rack of lamb filled with colonnata lard, vegetable caponata, grilled polenta and herbs; orecchiette with ragout of prawns, cherry tomatoes and tuna bottarga; and a "design your own antipasti" option with selections such as rabbit pâté with white truffle cream.



WHEN YOU BUILD AN EMPIRE, it's crucial to know how—and to whom—to delegate responsibility to avoid being spread too thin. Ken Oringer seems to have controlled that risk by partnering with Toro chef Jamie Bissonnette to open Coppa inside the former Dish space on Shawmut Avenue. "We'll both be picking a chef," says Oringer, who describes the new project as a "very casual, neighborhood enoteca with small plates, very reasonably priced, from five to 13 dollars." Expect a strong emphasis on "sustainable, local, seasonal" ingredients, such as pastas made with eggs from a nearby farm.

MEANWHILE, BACK AT UNI, chef Chris Chung is making a splash with his return to the kitchen after a hiatus during which he cooked—or uncooked—for private catering and dining. Today, "sushi chefs are a dime ▪ dozen," says Oringer, with the exception of Chung, of course.

Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. stellaartois.com

NO PLACE LIKE HOME

Il Casale brings the rural Italian dinner to Belmont.

IL COMMUNICATION The Pallotta sisters peruse the menu before telling their tale over misto griglia.

THERE ARE CERTAIN FOOD occasions that are hard to describe. Sitting at an Italian family's table surrounded by plates of food while guests eat, laugh and chatter about life would be one. In a few words, it's warm, comforting and feels like home.

A recent night out with Nebo owners Christine and Carla Pallotta (full-blooded Italians and North End natives) felt true to that moment. We ate at Il Casale, Dante de Magistris' new Belmont restaurant, where affinity and family-style cooking made for an unforgettable meal.

"It's so homey in here, I love it," commented Carla, while sipping on a Saracco Moscato d'Asti ($9). Built into a former firehouse, Il Casale—"the country home" in Italian—actually feels more like an urban loft, with high ceilings, sleek upholstery, low-hanging chandeliers and gaping windows.

The three of us excitedly perused the menu (Christine: "I want everything.") until Dante came out to offer suggestions. He guided us toward the Fiat, a four-course tasting ($35 per person). With a few quick ideas from us—there were dishes we were anxious to try—he was off, yelling "have fun" over his shoulder.

As a tag team, the Pallottas then began the story of how they made the leap four years ago from salon owners to cooks in their own Italian restaurant. "We were both in our 40s and looking for a life change," said Carla, adding, "and these industries are very similar. It's hospitality. And we used to eat out all the time, so we knew what we wanted in a restaurant." Christine chimed in, "What we cook is the food we ate every night. It's very similar to what Dante's doing. He is spot on with this place."

With that, the parade of family-style dishes arrived, starting with a platter of bruschetta (pomodoro, fegatini and pepperonata at $5 each). Both sisters savored each bite, commenting on the sweetness of the tomatoes, the sharpness of the oregano and the subtlety of the olive oil. Christine raved, "It's so simple, but you can taste every ingredient."

We also tried the tonnata ($5), slivers of sliced roast pork loin on top of a puréed tuna sauce—which Carla sopped up with the chewy, house-made bread—along with beef carpaccio ($5) with a schmear of creamy gorgonzola, crispy salt cod fritters ($5) and burrata ($5) dotted with pistachio bits and fresh oregano.

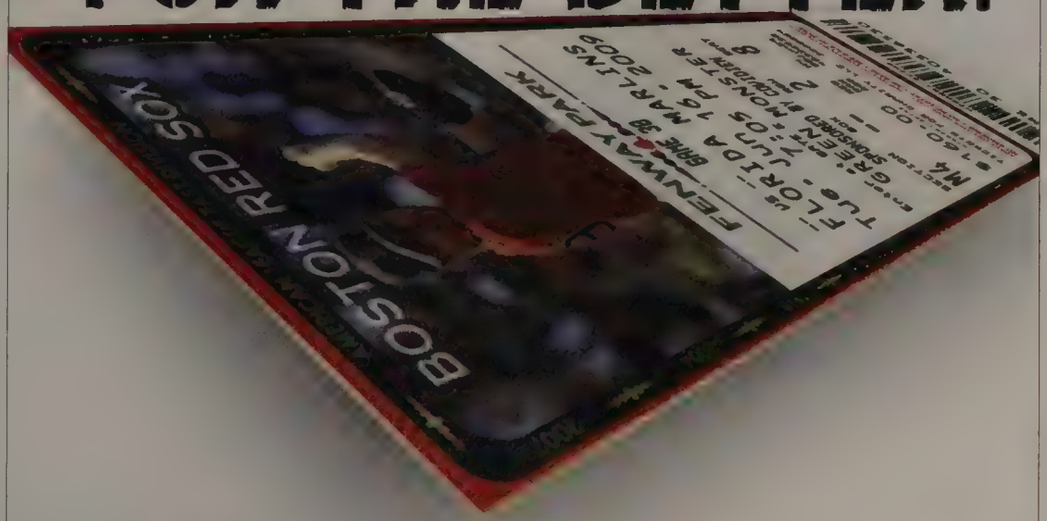
Carla observed that Il Casale uses variations on family recipes. "I think that Dante gets it right because he really lived it," she said. "It was a part of his childhood." The Vesuvio pasta ($11 half, $19 whole) arrived next, with each belly-button-shaped noodle holding a rich goat ragout and a light, creamy layer of caccio cavalo fonduta cheese. The minestra ($8 half, $15 whole), a shallow bowl of pork broth containing a slice of cornmeal "pizza" smothered in braised escarole and dandelion greens, made both sisters swoon. "This is home," Carla explained. "This is my mother's cooking."

An army of entrees next appeared: the Wagyu bistecca (market price) drizzled with a rosemary reduction; the misto griglia ($18), or mixed grill of scallops, shrimp, sardines and calamari; and Dante's mother's delicious rosemary-flecked roast chicken ($16). Sides ($5 each) included a platter of sautéed wild mushrooms over toast squares, a parmigianetta of tomato, eggplant and egg, and a green bean salad with olives and pine nuts.



After a few desserts like silky panna cotta ($7) with balsamic-drizzled strawberries and a creamy tiramisu ($6), our dinner party ended the way most do. We gathered in the kitchen, chatting over Dante's wood-fired grill. ×××

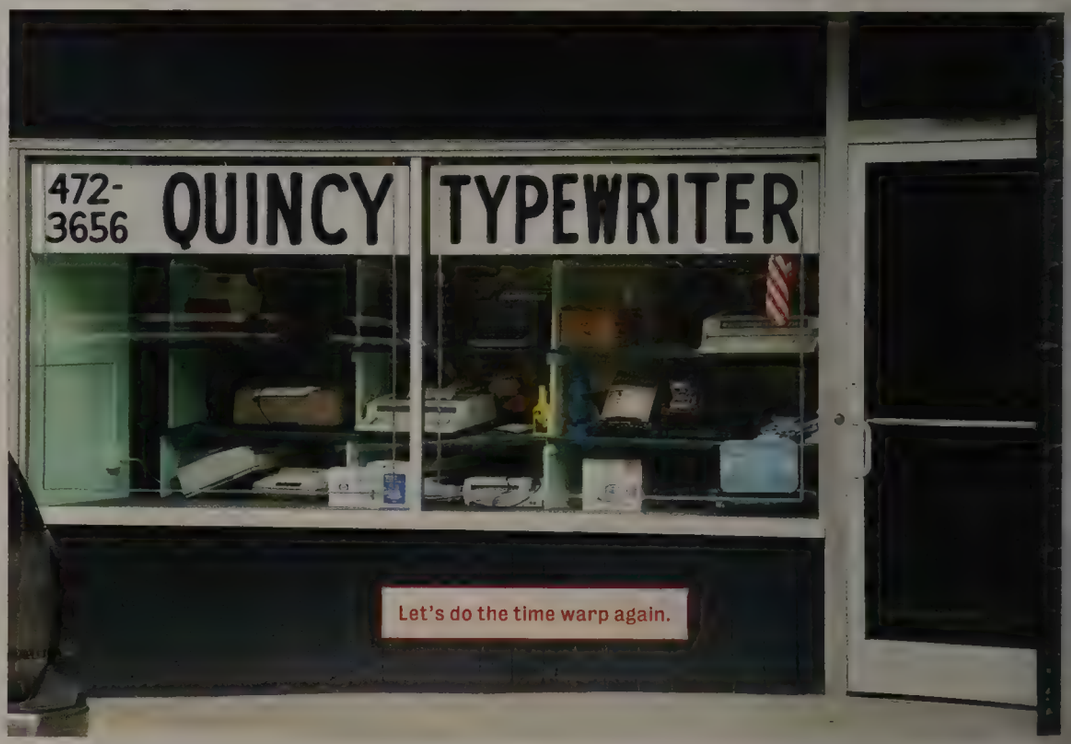
REDO THE Q

Quincy plans to give its entire downtown a makeover.



PEOPLE GET NERVOUS ABOUT redevelopment projects for good reason. Nobody sets out to build a blighted eyesore, but today's ghastly relic was yesterday's shining vision of the future. When Frederick Law Olmsted designed the Back Bay Fens, he probably wasn't thinking, "You know, someday this will be a great place for homeless people to make Red Sox fans uncomfortable with their decision to park on the street."

So naturally, there's trepidation surrounding Quincy's plan to give its downtown a $1.2 billion makeover. About 70 percent of the turf is controlled by the city and a developer called Street Works, and construction is supposed to start next year. I'm all in favor of this, as plans call for 20-foot-wide sidewalks with outdoor cafes, easy parking around the periphery, and a traffic bypass so that you don't have to drive through town to get to the highway. However, I hope that in the course of this wholesale reinvention, the developers manage to retain a bit of Quincy's unique brand of strangeness.

Quincy isn't funky in a "hipsters visit to drink Miller High Life in an ironic fashion" sort of way. If that were so, there'd be an American Apparel next to Bad Abbots bar. Quincy is more eccentric than that. We're talking about a town that has an Irish beach bar (the Beachcomber), parking spaces reserved for particular yacht owners (at Marina Bay) and a Brazilian steakhouse across the street from a joke shop. You can valet your car at a top-notch Italian restaurant, Alba, then walk 50 feet to play Keno and buy nudie magazines. Quincy is all over the place. But that organic mishmash of businesses is what gives places an authentic sense of history, the sort that's often lacking in soulless new developments. That said, I'm not sure where the new Quincy Center will find space for a typewriter store.

That's correct: Quincy has a typewriter store. When my buddy Dave first visited my house, he said, "Quincy seems to be filled with places that should've gone out of business 40 years ago." And yet, against all odds, haven't.

In Quincy, you can still say, "I was on my way to get a new typewriter cartridge when I saw the milkman getting his vacuum cleaner repaired." Indeed, there is a milkman, and the typewriter store is only a few blocks from the vacuum-repair business. Roxie's meat market thrives right across the street from Stop & Shop. I learned why Roxie's is so popular when I ventured in to buy a roast, and it cost about 50 cents. Somebody needs to tell Roxie about inflation and how that's affected prices since it opened in 1957.

Down the street from me, there's an independent grocery store that was used as a location for the upcoming Cameron Diaz movie The Box. The film is set in 1976. To alter the market's appearance to fit the era, I'm pretty sure that all they had to do was park some old cars outside and get rid of the 30-packs in the beer cooler.

Even the Bank of America branch downtown looks like the set of a 1940s heist movie, complete with lots of marble and a giant vault bearing a sign that reads, "Vault." When you enter, you half expect to be confronted by a guy wearing a double-breasted pin-striped suit, wielding a Tommy gun and yelling "Stick 'em up, see! Gimme all your loot, dames, and nobody gets plugged!"

I don't want to say that Quincy has a hard time letting go of the past, but the community group that promotes future business development is called Quincy 2000. In the year 2000... telephones will include miniature typewriters that can be used to schedule milk delivery... in the year 2000! I'd recommend that they follow Conan's lead and change their name to Quincy 3000, but there's probably still a lot of stationery to use up.

Since Quincy clearly has a soft spot for the past, I wonder if there'll be room for a few of these throwback businesses amid the coming spiffy newness. I like the idea that if my vacuum breaks, I can get it fixed instead of buying a new one. Likewise, when our dog rammed his head through a window screen, I didn't go to Home Depot for a replacement—I got it fixed at Quincy Shade & Screen, Co. I appreciate mom-and-pop businesses, lovable anachronisms. And I'm fond of the idea that technical superiority doesn't always spell doom for the incumbent way of life. So when Quincy's total overhaul is complete, I hope I'll still be able to say, "I'm heading into town to go to the meat market. And pick up a magazine." ✖✖✖

A BIG HIT

In praise of tough guy Rodney Harrison

A FEW YEARS BACK, the Massachusetts State Police put together a "Stop the Violence" public service announcement. The department asked me to help coordinate the effort, throwing out a few names of professional athletes who could collaborate on the campaign. The name at the top of the list was Patriots safety Rodney Harrison. I was a little surprised at first. It seemed like an odd fit considering the reputation Harrison had as a dirty player or a cheap-shot artist.

But upon further review, he was the perfect choice. The difference between Rodney Harrison the football player and Rodney Harrison the public citizen was, and still is, astounding. If the two Harrisons were walking down the street and bumped into each other, the truth is neither would recognize the other. Simply put, he was a different man when he got inside the white lines with pads in tow.

I remember back in March '03, when the Pats signed the hard-hitting safety. I was confused. They already had such a player in Lawyer Milloy, who was making a big chunk of change. While bringing Harrison on board seemed like an interesting proposition, it didn't feel right.

Of course, Bill Belichick doesn't miss much, if anything, when it comes to grading talent. The coach requested Milloy take a pay cut because his play wasn't worth $3 million-plus anymore. And Milloy was traded away five days before the season was supposed to start. Talk about confusion. Talk about anger. Talk about having a great thing and blowing it up.

Or so I thought.

Back to Harrison. He made his mark immediately in double sessions by laying out a walking Patriots legend in practice. That's right, Harrison put the wood to "our" Troy Brown, sending him to the turf. It caused quite an uproar, especially from Brown's offensive teammates. Was this Harrison guy nuts? No. He was tough. And if you invaded his territory, he bit you.

Belichick's response to Harrison's retirement speaks volumes about his contributions during the Super Bowl seasons of 2003 and 2004, in particular. The coach called him the best practice player he has seen in his 35 years in the game. Remember, Belichick has coached a couple of legends, including Lawrence Taylor and Tom Brady.

There never was any doubt about Harrison. You were always going to get his best on Sunday, plus an elbow to the spleen, maybe, or the unseen punch to the gut. But it was all in good fun.

As a Patriot, he went, in record time, from being the biggest villain within his own locker room after the "dirty" Brown hit to being so respected and loved that he was made a captain. All this in the course of one training camp. That's an honor typically bestowed on guys who've been in the organization for at least a couple of seasons. Putting the "C" next to his name showed what he represented.

I remember the scene at the Super Bowl in Houston when, at the end of the game, Harrison gave Belichick a bear hug and thanked the coach for convincing him to come to Foxboro. We later discovered that Belichick thanked Harrison for accepting the team's offer.

Harrison's legacy isn't just his bone-crunching hits. He leaves the game as the only player in NFL history with at least 30 sacks (35.5) and 30 interceptions (34). His playoff "picks" have been historic, too, intercepting Peyton Manning in both Patriots playoff wins in 2003 and 2004. He also had the key interception against Pittsburgh in the AFC Championship in 2003 and the Super Bowl championship over the Eagles in 2004.

But above all: Every offensive player was aware of Harrison's whereabouts. If you weren't paying attention, you usually paid for it. Sure, he won several "dirtiest player in the league" polls, the most recent of which was in 2008 by the NFL coaches (11 of 17 voted for Harrison). But every one of those coaches would've loved having him man their two-deep zone.

Harrison called himself feisty in his closing press conference earlier this month. Feisty isn't a feisty enough term. His inability to stay healthy for an entire season over the last three years played into his decision to join NBC-TV this fall. It's a young man's game, and after 15 years it was time to let the kids beat on each other.

Is Harrison a Hall of Famer? I say yes.

Two potential obstacles, though: He plays a position that historically gets overlooked come voting time, and he was suspended for buying human growth hormone. But the guy made a difference when he played. And he played on winners, which he said means more than any Hall of Fame inductions.

It's tough to see the good ones go, but they eventually do. And Harrison was a great one, on and off the field. Of all the players who've said good-bye over the past half-dozen years, he represents a true Patriot. ✖✖✖

ON JACOBY, KESSEL, HAPPY GILMORE AND SMOLTZ

5 QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Is Tim Wakefield an All-Star? Here are two words for anyone who claims that Wakefield's inflated E.R.A. makes him unfit for an All-Star nod: Scott. Cooper. Honestly, it's not like we're talking about the Hall of Fame, right? The All-Star Game is a joke! But as the winningest pitcher on the AL's best team, it's a joke that Timmy deserves to be in on.

Is Rajon Rondo Untouchable? Of course not. When Danny Ainge is involved, "untouchable" is a word that doesn't exist. Like faploogin. But there's a huge difference between actively shopping a guy and merely exploring all your options, and with Rondo, Ainge is most definitely doing the latter. (Or at least that's how our therapist suggests we interpret things.)

Is Josh Beckett the Best Pitcher in the American League? Roy Halladay and Zach Greinke have the upper hand right now, but come October, Beckett will be the best AL hurler with something left to pitch for. Although he might not be as effective when the Sox roll out their unprecedented eight-man playoff rotation.

Will Jacoby Ellsbury Ever Become a Bona Fide Leadoff Man? If he's got quality, speed and a consistent bat, you can mold almost any young prospect into a serviceable leadoff presence. But the great ones aren't made, they're born. See Johnny Damon, one of the dumbest humans alive, yet perhaps the most cunning leadoff man of the last 10 years. Ellsbury is still a prime candidate to realize his All-Star dreams, but it'll happen from another spot in the lineup.

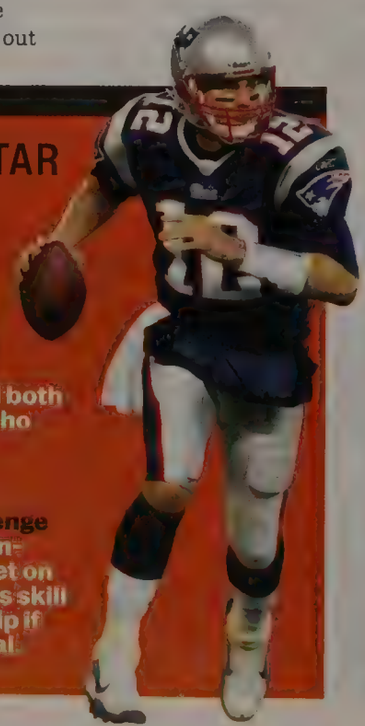
Have We Seen the Last of Phil Kessel? All signs point to yes, and typically we'd kill the B's for letting another young stud skate away to "greener" pastures. But not this time. After all, with the ink still drying on David Krejci's deal, and Looch and Wheeler due for extensions next summer, how much more cash can there be? Let's not forget who's begrudgingly signing the checks.

1 ONE VERY RANDOM STAT

Kendrick Perkins won only 39 percent of his jump balls last season—the worst figure for any player with at least 50 chances. That's interesting, but we have no faploogin idea what it proves (except that somewhere out there a stats geek has way too much time on his hands).

4 DATES TO WATCH

6/25 John Smoltz makes his long-awaited major league debut for the Sox. Although, can you really call it "major league" when he's pitching against the Nationals?



7/1 NBA free agency is officially under way. For the record, we predict that Big Baby ends up in Detroit, Rasheed Wallace comes to Boston and Lucky the Leprechaun lands a sweet, three-figure deal at Charlestown High.

7/3 For the first time in 10 years, Ken Griffey Jr. arrives in Boston as a member of the Seattle Mariners. It'll be just like the summer of '99, only you won't have an awful Sugar Ray song stuck in your head.

7/5 It's Judgment Day at Wimbledon, as Roger Federer and Rafael Nadal battle it out for Grand Slam supremacy. Or, if they don't meet in the final, we'll just forget that it's on.

SEND FEEDBACK TO RICH@IMPROPER.COM AND READ MORE AT COMCASTSPORTSNET.COM.

2 DREAM SUPERSTAR MATCHUPS

Ray Allen vs. Tom Brady—18 holes at TPC Boston Brady's an eight handicap, while Ray's a "hefty" 12. But considering that Tom's still slightly handicapped, this could be a classic. Now here's the question: We're all even on the 18th green and both guys have a 10-footer to save par. Who you got?

Brad Penny vs. Happy Gilmore—The "Baseballs Off the Chest" Challenge After watching Penny absorb that liner against Florida, we'd probably bet on him against a brick wall. Too bad this skill would only work as a bargaining chip if Theo was trading Penny to a carnival.

3 Potential Red Sox Endorsement Deals

David Ortiz for Visine "Hey everybody, Big Papi here. You know, two months ago I was a lot like you: I didn't have any Papi power! But then I tried these Visine eye drops and look, I'm back! Visine made me whole again. Plus, unlike that stuff Manny endorses, it didn't make me grow boobs."

Dice-K for Dos Equis "He once pitched five innings in the time it takes to watch Dances With Wolves. Cokeheads DVR his outings to help them sleep. The CIA makes prisoners watch his starts as an alternative to water-boarding. He's Daisuke Matsuzaka, and he's the most boring pitcher in the world."

Rocco Baldelli for Icy Hot Pro-Therapy [Baldelli sits in the clubhouse, wrapped head to toe in bandages.] "Oh hey, I didn't see you there. I'm Rocco Baldelli, and when I'm hit with one or 15 of the thousands of injuries that can sabotage a major league season, there's only one brand I trust. Thanks, Icy Hot!" [Awkwardly raises right thumb while wincing in pain.]

Soroff On EUGENE MIRMAN

The author/comedian on potato costumes, Henry Kissinger and touring with Flight of the Conchords

COMEDIAN EUGENE MIRMAN WAS BORN IN RUSSIA but immigrated to the U.S. at an early age. Mirman, 34, grew up in Lexington and launched his career in stand-up after attending Hampshire College. His most recent album is En Garde, Society! He has appeared on Late Night With Conan O'Brien, Last Call With Carson Daly and in his own half-hour special on Comedy Central. He's also played recurring roles on HBO's cult hit Flight of the Conchords, Aqua Teen Hunger Force and the new Adult Swim series Delocated. In addition to touring the country regularly, Mirman has appeared on the same bill with such bands as Yo La Tengo, Modest Mouse, the Shins and Cake, and he recently published his first book, the self-help satire The Will to Whatevs. He makes short videos for the Web site 236.com and is working on a documentary about his first visit back to Russia. Also, Mirman once played a spokes-potato on the Food Network. He lives in Brooklyn.

Jonathan Soroff: First of all, any relation to Ethel?
Eugene Mirman: No. That's the most you'll get out of me about that.

How about the name Eugene. How much crap did you take for that as a kid?
A reasonable amount. It wasn't the most popular '80s name.

So what did they call you?
Oh, Mr. Awesome. Dr. Homo. Mostly rhyme-y things. Kids are only so clever. But they are mean-spirited, so they make up for it that way.

Top three songs on your iPod?
I just downloaded this super-catchy song by Julian Cope. It's got a very long title, and I'll say it to you accurately. Ready? "All the Blowing-Themselves-Up Motherfers (Will Realise the Minute They Die That They Were Suckers)."

Communism versus capitalism. Most glaring difference?
Capitalism enslaves its own citizens much less.

Is it strange that I find Vladimir Putin kind of sexy?
Power is sexy. That's why he and Kissinger are so cute.

Is being a nebbish-y Jew like Woody Allen a help in doing stand-up?
Sure, if you can pull it off. Is Woody Allen good at stand-up? The answer would be yes. He is very, very good at it. Most people with a nebbish-y stage persona are very funny.

In college, you majored in comedy.
I went to Hampshire, where you design your own major, so I basically took classes in writing, film, acting, sociology, philosophy and for my thesis did a one-hour stand-up act. What's funny is that most people said, "That's a silly thing to major in. Shouldn't you do something you can get a job in?" And now I'm a comedian. So it turned out that my major was like a trade school.

Favorite TV show?
Right now, I'd probably say Mad Men.

Ever wonder why so many comedians come out of Boston?
Yes, I do actually wonder. It's interesting.

What do you attribute it to?
A lot of the comedy that comes from Boston is a combination of very smart and sort of blue-collar, so I think there are all these different influences.

Most outlandish thing you've ever done?
I guess the time I stole a boat in Boston Harbor with Jon Benjamin. We took a small boat and then put it back.

You got away with it?
Yeah. And we left $200, so it was more like renting a boat without permission. That's how I look at it.

The word "whatevs." Is it the most annoying term to enter the current lexicon?
It's up there. But eventually, what annoys you becomes you.

Would you take your clothes off for money?
Depends on the amount. Ten million dollars? Probably. Would I then allow photographs? Maybe not unless they added another million.

What did you learn from being a spokes-potato?
It taught me that people would give you money in exchange for dressing up like a potato for two days.

Was that humiliating?
No, I was pretty neutral about it. It was fun. I mean, I'm a comedian. I'll do anything silly.

Greatest honor of your career?
Maybe being named Rolling Stone's Hot Twitter on Tweeter for 2009. [Laughs.] Seriously? It probably involves the comedians I know and work with and mutually respect and admire. Having people who were heroes be colleagues.

Don't you think Bret [from Flight of the Conchords] is cute?
Yes. I think they're both very cute.

Any hanky-panky goin' on there? You know how open-minded those Kiwis are.
Since they're both straight and both married/engaged, no. And I traveled with them on a bus, so I would know.

That kind of punctures my fantasy.
That's good. I'm glad I ruined your weird fantasy.

Do you wax or laser?
Both. And not on myself. I run an extraordinarily unprofessional coffee shop.

Biggest difference in your diet since you became a big star?
A lot more kimchee.

Do you believe that whatshisname had to bow out of his Broadway show because he got mercury poisoning from eating sushi?
I think we both have about as much information as we're likely to get, especially given that we're both blanking on his name. And I think not thinking about it has made me a better person. It's a crime I'd never try to solve.

True or false: The national anthem of Canada should really be "Ummm, Canada."
No. They need the self-respect. You can't tease people who need self-respect.

Conan or Leno?
Conan. Who wouldn't? Even Leno would say, "Conan."

Who's funnier, you or Chevy Chase?
Luckily, that's not a contest I ever entered.

Can you have Flight of the Conchords sing a song about me?
Absolutely! But it would probably get edited out. ✖✖✖

It's Raining Men

5 comics in naughty poses

By Andrew Rimas

Photographs by Kim Kennedy

It's fair to say that relativism has dripped, like so much edible massage oil, onto society's bedsheets. Hardcore fetish Web sites have proven that what floats one person's boat will torpedo another person's libido faster than you can say "a deep, passionate kiss with loose dentures." Which would probably float someone's boat.

Even so, when women are asked, "What do you find sexy in a man?" one of the most common responses is "his sense of humor." In the following pages, we put that answer to an extremely rigorous test. So rigorous that it suffers a seizure, and we bury it in an unmarked grave.

Five local comedians, some of them clad in little more than healthy self-deprecation, agreed to pose for us as pinups. Playmates with back hair, if you will. The resulting images are, if not strictly erotic, then hopefully funnier than the sight of another pouty girl in her undies.

Funny bone vs. abdominal tone: Let the public decide.

Name: "The Dangerous" Joe Wong

Hometown: Baishan, Jilin Province, China

Height: 5'8" from a distance

Weight: 125 lbs

Measurements: 36"/29"/37"

Turn-ons: Women who love short, nerdy guys with glasses.

Turn-offs: Adults who listen to music and move their heads from side to side, including women who love short, nerdy guys with glasses.

Most exciting experience: My car climbed Mount Washington.

My idea of a romantic evening involves: Having a conversation while looking at urban squalor. Disused pipes, concrete slabs with steel rods jutting out, puddles of dirty water and graffiti will do. As long as it doesn't smell too bad.

Naughty secret: Sometimes I untuck my shirt to look cooler, especially when I am sitting on a chair at a shopping mall holding my wife's purse.

This year, Joe Wong appeared on The Late Show With David Letterman and Ellen DeGeneres' variety special Ellen's Bigger, Longer and Wider Show. He was a finalist in the 2003 Boston Comedy Festival, and he performs regularly at Sally O'Brien's and the Burren. He'll be at the Comedy Studio on June 27, Dick's Beantown Comedy Vault on July 17 and at Nick's Comedy Stop July 24–25.

Ken Reid as Marilyn Monroe

Name: Ken Reid

Hometown: Melrose, Mass.

Height: 6'3"

Weight: 190 lbs (13.5 stones for the English ladies)

Measurements: Chest: 0.00020115190785 league [nautical]. Waist: 2 sexy cubits. Seat: It's like two 1-liter bottles of wildflower honey strapped together with duct tape. But expensive duct tape.

Turn-ons: Quality sodas, the cast of Just the Ten of Us, Wonder Woman.

Turn-offs: Sense of humor, thinking Jimmy Buffett is "fun," bacterial infections.

Most exciting experience: Visiting the Monroeville Mall just outside of Pittsburgh, Pa. (the shooting location for the original Dawn of the Dead), alone, on a Tuesday in 2006.

My idea of a romantic evening involves: Two pizzas (his and hers), a couch-cushion fort and a Real Genius/Revenge of the Nerds double feature.

Naughty secret: The first time I had a sexual dream it involved Tracy "Heather from TV's Mr. Belvedere" Wells. I saw her bra.

Ken Reid appeared in the 2009 Alternative Comedy Festival, performed at the Boston Music Awards and hosts every other Friday night at the Comedy Studio. He starred in two full-length one-man shows (Cusack Attack and Ken Reid's Very Special Episode) and will be staging his third, Ken Reid's Music to My Years, sometime in the fall. Visit ikenreid.com.

Myq Kaplan as Burt Reynolds

Name: Myq Kaplan

Hometown: Where-the-heart-is-ville

Height: 6'6", give or take a foot. (Take. Definitely take.)

Weight: Awesome

Measurements: Big, small, cute. Hike! (It's a football joke, I think!)

Turn-ons: Attractive women, sexy clothing or not clothing, the Platonic ideal of good-lookingness. Nothing weird that I'm hiding from you.

Turn-offs: Unattractive ladies and men, non-sexy clothing, especially ties, unless worn in a sexy way. Never mind, I can't think of any unsexy way to wear a tie, so ties are fine. The Platonic ideal of ugly broads (that's a thing, right?). Wait, unless the tie is being worn by me. At a funeral. Of an attractive woman. Big turn-off.

Most exciting experience: Writing this answer. Or do you mean sexually? Because then it's still writing this answer.

My idea of a romantic evening involves: An attractive woman, no ties probably and lots of talk about Greek philosophy. Obviously.

Naughty secret: I'm in the witness protection program, and I'm not supposed to tell anyone. Shhhh. I'm bad.

Myq Kaplan appeared on Comedy Central's Live at Gotham and won the 2009 March Comedy Madness competition at Carolines on Broadway in NYC. He has a blog at godzillionaire.blogspot.com and a Web site at myqkaplan.com where you can read more writing by and bragging about Myq Kaplan, respectively.

Tony V as Jason Alexander

Name: Tony V

Hometown: Citizen of the world

Height: 19 hands

Weight: 16 stones

Measurements: Chest: massive. Waist: not. Seat: ample and comfortable.

Turn-ons: Vaginas.

Turn-offs: 16 things that are not vaginas.

Most exciting experience: I once saw Liza Minnelli without any makeup on. Then I witnessed suburban, corporate, straight white guys try to dance to a Billy Joel tribute band. Both in the same week. All I'm saying is that I have seen things that would make ordinary men want to pour bleach on their own eyes... and that excites me.

My idea of a romantic evening involves: Curling up with my special lady in my crib, lights down low, my limited edition Tournament of Champions bowling DVD and box of Reunite. (If you hear roughly the same thing from Owen Wilson, he stole it from me).

Naughty secret: My life, my love and my lady is the sea.

Tony V costars in the film World's Greatest Dad, directed by Bobcat Goldthwait and starring Robin Williams, due out in August. He also had a recurring role on Showtime's Brotherhood. "And if you can't find me every four or five weeks performing at Giggles Comedy Club, Route 1 (southbound) in Saugus, you aren't looking very hard."

Zach Sherwin as Mena Suvari

Name: Zach Sherwin, aka MC Mr. Napkins

Hometown: Cambridge

Weight: 409,300 carats... ladies

Height: 4.5 cubits... ladies

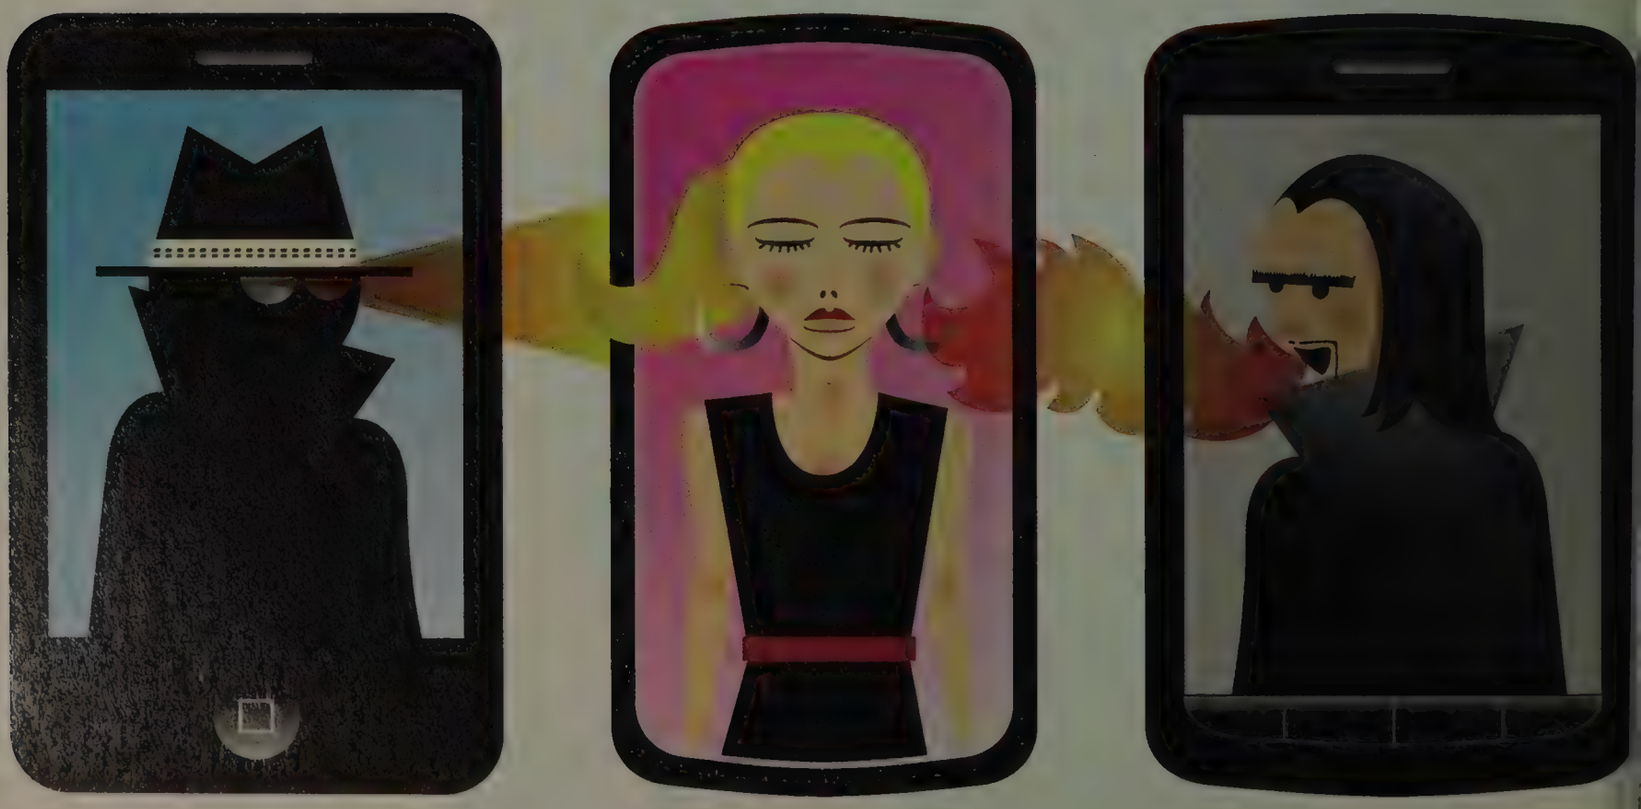
Measurements: 36"/36"/36" (when in were-python form).

Turn-ons: Turntables, turnpikes, turnovers.

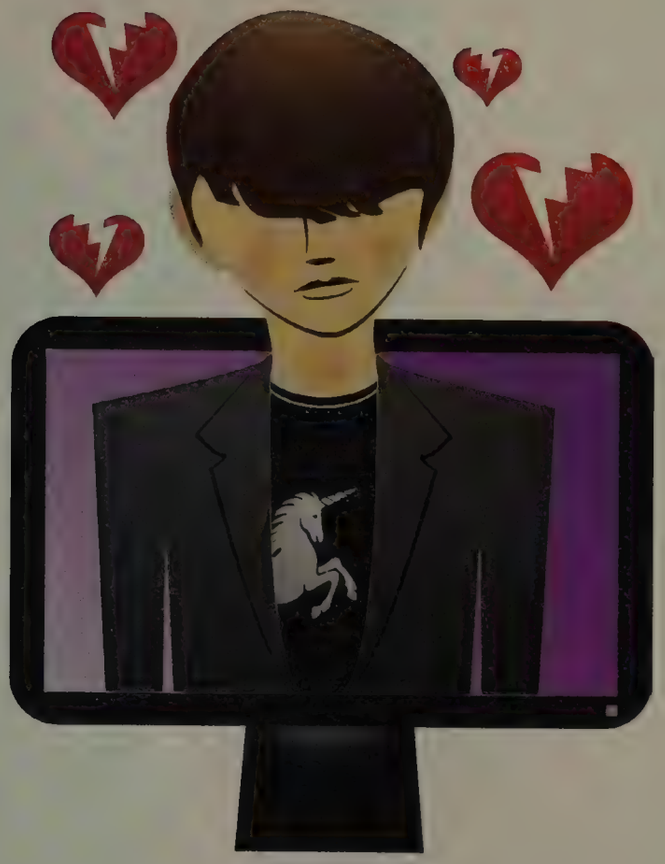
Turn-offs: Turncoats, turnips, gleeking.

Most exciting experience: Out-slithering a spear-toting tribe of Amazon jungle hunters (again, as a were-python).

My idea of a romantic evening involves: Literally hours of Frenching.



Naughty secret: This picture is hot, but I'd actually rather be dressed up as the plastic bag.



Zach Sherwin hosts Thursdays at the Comedy Studio in Harvard Square and will be performing at the Montreal Just for Laughs Comedy Festival in July. He also stars in his own Sierra Mist "Funny Break" on YouTube.

Confessions of a Facebook Stalker

BY JOHN DYER ILLUSTRATIONS BY REST

Recently, I found myself scanning Facebook on a Saturday afternoon, my neck pitched uncomfortably forward as I searched for the page of a guy named Sasho* in Bulgaria. Outside, the sun was shining. Birds were singing. Bees were buzzing. My job entails staring at a computer screen all day long. It was my day off. What the hell was I doing?

Sasho is my ex-girlfriend's lover. Usually my exes' boyfriends don't preoccupy me (really), but Sasho had found some amorous notes I'd texted to Polina's phone a few days before and, angry and drunk, had called me in the middle of the night to complain. Despite his bad English, he had an admirable command of American curses. Around the third or fourth time he told me to perform an obscene act on myself, I hung up, but not before he mentioned his name.

Sure, Sasho had reason to be miffed. Polina and I had hooked up when I visited Bulgaria earlier this year. Later, she told me she hadn't been seeing him then. But, nonetheless, after his call my jealousy kicked into overdrive, and I became curious. In fact, I became obsessed. My plan had been to return to Bulgaria this summer and potentially date Polina again. Suddenly, I had a rival. I wanted to see his face, see his friends, see if I knew his friends.

I quickly became a Facebook stalker.

Question: Who else has a story like mine? Answer: Almost everyone with access to technology. No, we haven't all been lucky enough to receive calls from incensed drunken Bulgarians in the middle of the night. But each person among the handful of the 200 million Facebook users I've polled has a story about the site touching their love lives—largely negatively, except for the dudes who reported Facebook-arranged one-night stands. These dudes, by the way, were more than happy to offer details that would fall under TMI. Terms like "fabulous," "awesome" and "I'd do it again" came up often. The women, strangely, neglected to mention their one-nighters. They emphasized how their meaningful relationships fared in relation to the site. Some things, it seems, never change.

I heard similar online-love stories from folks who connect regularly with the 125 million users on MySpace and the 17 million people who spend their days on Twitter telling followers they're ordering Mexican takeout, clipping their toenails or encountering what psychologist Carl Jung called "the God of Terror who dwells in the human soul." We live through the Internet now, which means we love through it, too.

Take Melanie, whose suspicions led her to spy on her boyfriend by secretly searching his AOL Instant Messenger. "I noticed through the AIM conversation that he was cheating," she explains. "I didn't tell him that I knew until a month later because I didn't want him to know I was snooping on his computer."

Eventually, Melanie, 22, confronted her boyfriend. "He kept denying it," she recalls. "I stopped talking to him, and then he told the truth. We took a break, but I was an idiot and went back to him. But what goes around comes around."

Two years after her betrayal, Melanie found a paramour of her own. Running late for class one morning, she dashed out of her dorm, leaving her Facebook page open for all eyes to read. "This was me being stupid," she admits. "I wasn't trying to [get] caught. I pretty much had it on the screen. He [the paramour] sent a message to me saying we shouldn't do this because I have a boyfriend. I said in the message that I liked him."

Oops. Melanie's relationship with her boyfriend has since dissolved.

So what are the consequences of this Web 2.0 stuff? There are many, and they stem from us keeping tabs on each other way too much. On sunny afternoons we scan pages for our ex's man in Bulgaria. We check our significant others' friends list to see if they're still in touch with so-and-so. We wonder why our lovers have accepted our platonic acquaintances as friends. We suspect the newcomers on their friends list are potential lovers. Sure, they'll claim these contacts are only "Facebook friends," but chances are we'll never fully believe them because, after all, our friends lists are littered with our own paramours or people we're keeping in the wings in case we need a rebounder.

"It's no longer, 'I would like you not to go to the bar where your ex-girlfriend goes,' but, 'I also don't want you to be Googling her or friending her on Facebook,'" says Boston-based couples therapist Rich Domenico, adding that the effects of social networking on romance is a budding subfield in counseling. "If there is not enough trust to begin with, these kinds of things can really threaten a relationship."

We live through the Internet now, which means we love through it, too.

While social networking sites are playgrounds for the green-eyed monster, they're also arenas for the exhibitionist inside all of us. We've become intensely aware of being watched on Facebook and its ilk. That's led many of us to spend ludicrous amounts of time crafting our pages to present the images we want the world to see, often to the detriment of our most intimate ties.

Ask musician John Mayer if he regrets Tweeting his every move, allegedly prompting Jennifer Aniston to dump him because she felt ignored. Mayer is a talented singer/songwriter, but something has gone wrong when a 31-year-old man chooses Twitter over one of the planet's most desirable hotties. "The technology enables these kind of fuzzy boundaries around fidelity, even if it's just emotional fidelity," Domenico observes.

We also know that others employ the same tricks we use to make ourselves look more interesting, so as we scan their pages, we read them like Talmudic scholars probing for deeper meanings or ad executives with the market in mind. "There's no way of hiding," said Melissa, 22. "My friends will say, 'Don't put this on Facebook.' That's the first reaction people have nowadays."

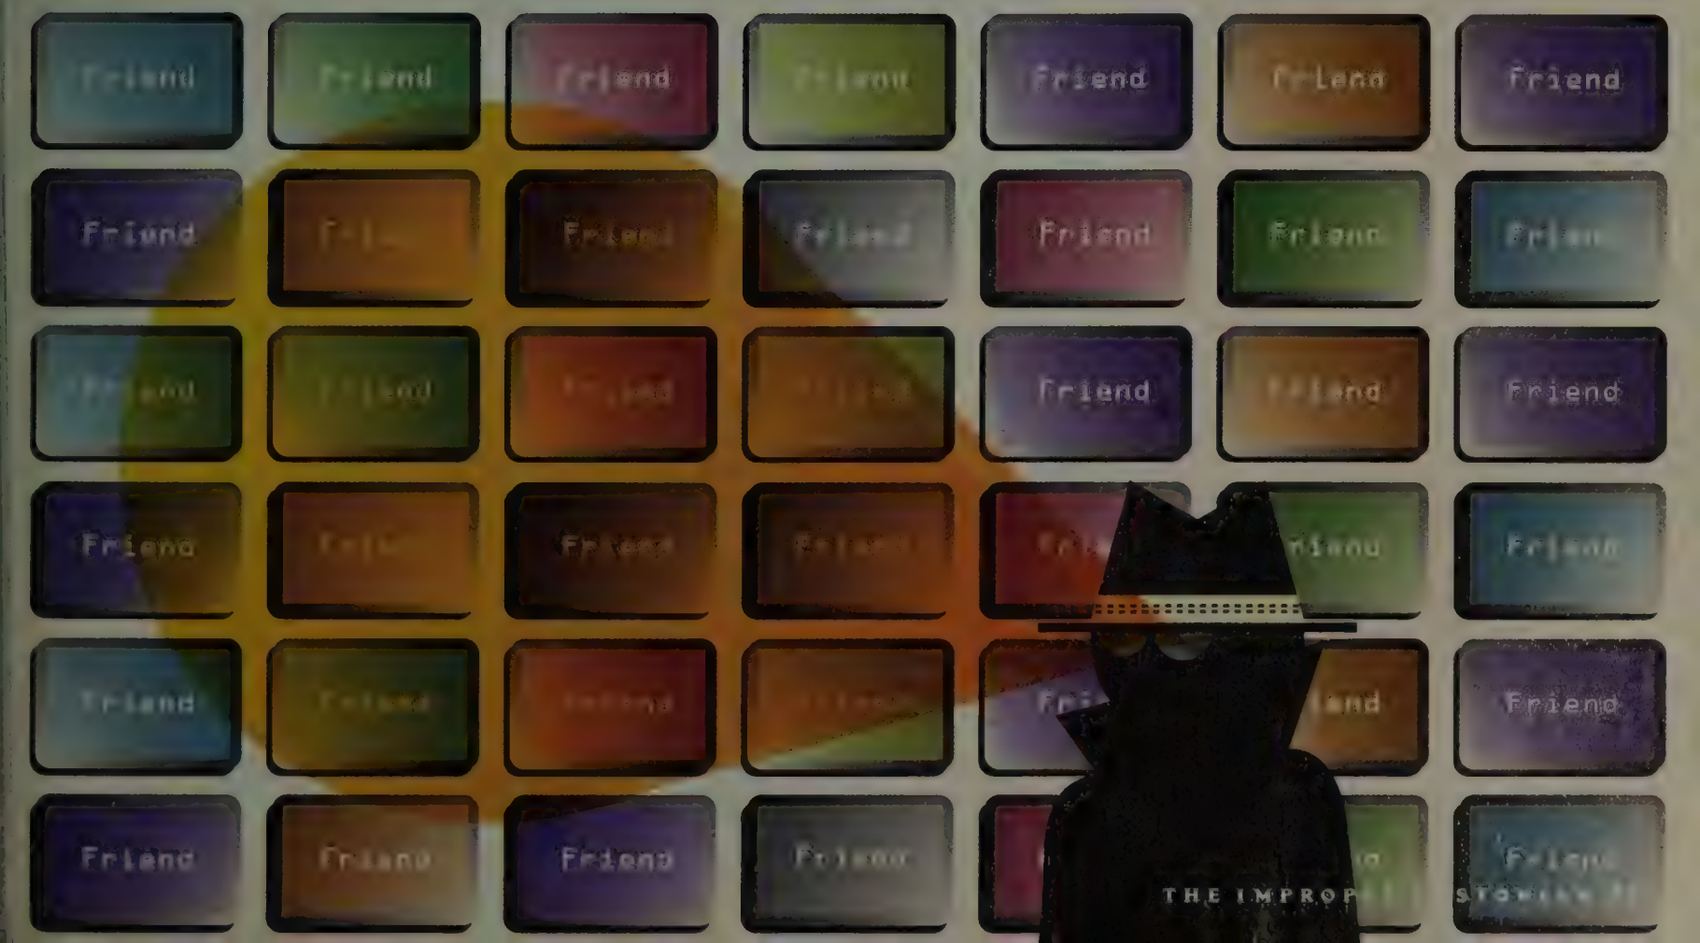
The excess attention people devote to their online profiles has led many to neglect erecting the personal boundaries they'd take for granted on the street, a lapse that has opened the door for users with good and bad intentions.

Andrew, 33, commonly attempts to "friend" all the attractive women on his friends' Facebook pages. Occasionally, he sends the ladies quick proposals to hook up, which is like asking every woman in a bar for her number. It's worked a handful of times, he says. "One is emboldened to suggest things that one would not in person."

The Craigslist Killer used a similar approach.

Of course, the site also has its success stories. Nicholas, 21, who is gay, regularly posts on Missed Connections. Last year, he traded glances with a cute man on Beacon Hill. He put an appeal on Craigslist, and the guy answered. "It totally worked for me," he said. They dated for three months before the man's job moved to Houston.

"They have all these friends all over the world, and they're so connected to all these people as they're sitting in front of their laptops at home, alone, night after night."



I'm not sure how my own situation will play out. As a big boy, I can face it: I fixated on Sasho because he's sleeping with a girl I miss. But Facebook amplified my obsessions, fed them. So I told Domenico about my Facebook stalking and asked for advice. His response was classically therapeutic. He offered comfort by assuring me I wasn't alone in my preoccupation—he had clients with stories similar to mine—but then lowered the boom by painting a stark picture of what was really happening.

"They have all these friends all over the world, and they're so connected to all these people as they're sitting in front of their laptops at home, alone, night after night," he said. "They have this rich virtual life but their real, brick-and-mortar life is much more lonely."

Ouch.

Heeding the professional's advice, I've refrained from trolling for Sasho. I have no idea what he looks like, after all. What would I do if I found him? Probably nothing. But mostly, after spending time in front of my computer contemplating a relationship that's faded, and realizing I was alone, I got bored. Anyways, things between Polina and me will never be the same. Not until I see her in person, at least. ✖✖✖

Global Influence

Freelance writer and philanthropist Mimi Stith's multicultural style doesn't believe in boundaries.

By Amanda Knorr | Photographs by Michael Piazza

Mimi Stith's spent more time on a plane than she has on the T. With a father who served as the ambassador to Tanzania, Africa, Stith, 27, started globetrotting at a very young age. And while she considers Brighton, Mass., her home, Dar es Salaam comes in a close second. With many friends still in Africa, a freelance job in London and an apartment in New York, her traveling results in an enviable melting pot of a closet.

Improper Bostonian: How would you describe your style?
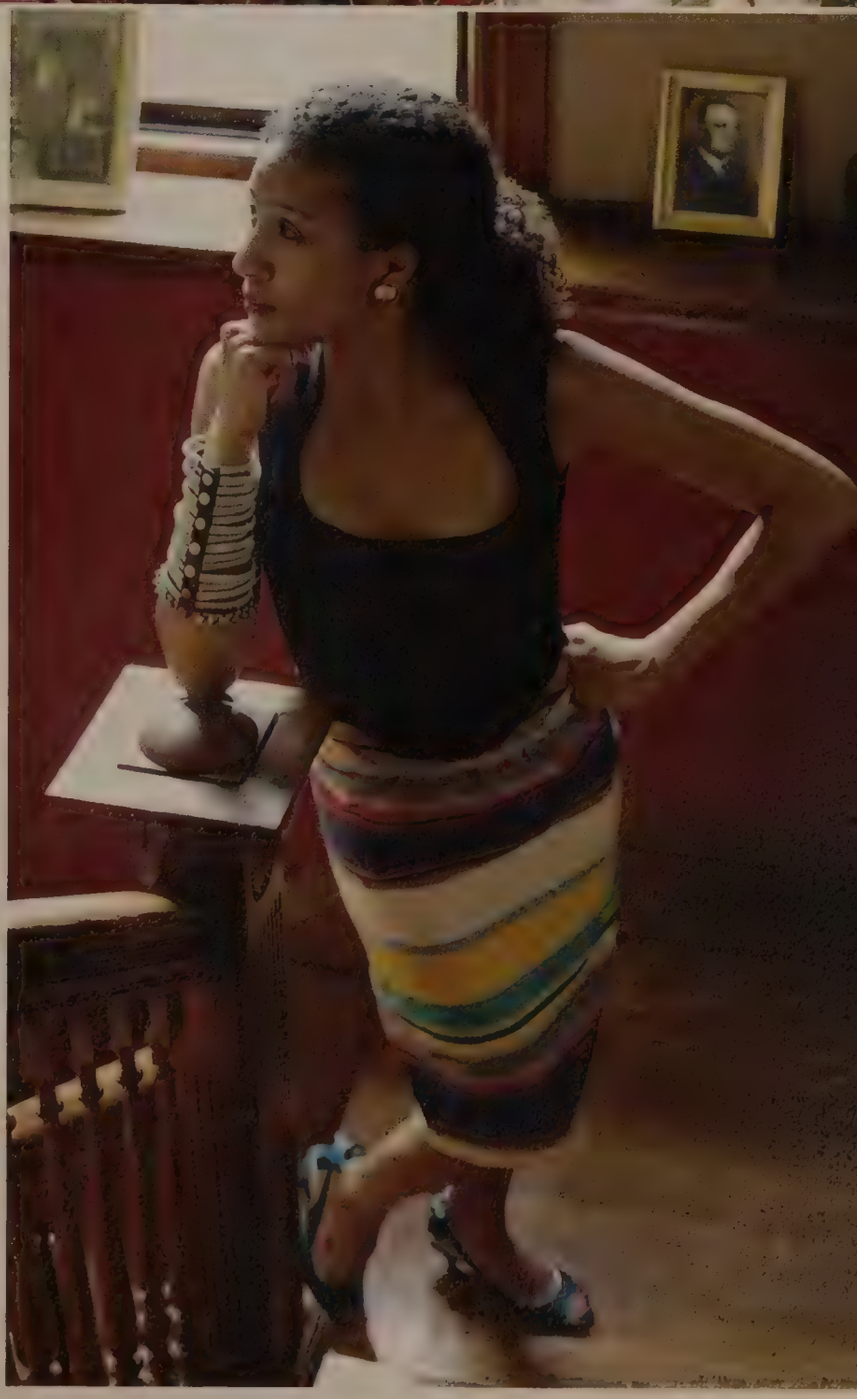
Mimi Stith: My style is fundamentally tropical but heavily influenced by the climates and cultures [where] I've visited and lived. Swimsuits are probably my favorite article of clothing, and I like linen, soft cotton, white and bright colors. My fashion sense is a little peculiar and idiosyncratic so it's hard to put it in one place.



Where do you like to shop in Boston?
I was a big fan of the downtown Filene's Basement, Brooks Brothers, Benetton and Urban Outfitters. But I like to go out and travel to find what I'm looking for.

What else do you love about this city?
The Emerald Necklace, Middlesex and the Bristol Lounge. My favorite restaurant in Boston is my house! My grandmother is an amazing chef from the Creole, Southern tradition. Although, she and I often enjoy New England cuisine together—apple pies, lobsters, oysters and fried-fish sandwiches.

What do you enjoy about dressing for Boston?
Boston winters dominate fashion choices. Looking fresh and feminine during the winter requires quite a bit of effort, so sometimes I don't beat myself up for throwing on a pair of slacks, a sweater and huge boots. Long johns, wool tights, a knee-length wool skirt and leather boots with a rubber sole make a great outfit. The coat is also very important in my life. My favorites are a black cashmere full-length with Chinese buttons and lining that my father designed for me and the other is a navy blue wool petticoat. Navy blue and chocolate brown are my favorite winter colors. I have to make an effort to wear black. It's very beautiful but can also be somber and severe.

Are there similarities between your wardrobe and home decor?
[They're] equally elemental and eclectic. My dress relies on earth tones and exotic finds, and my home has a lot of African art and, to be honest, is a bit girly. My godfather, fashion designer Alexander Julian, designed the bulk of my furniture. I'm from Roxbury and am heavily influenced by the architecture and the diversity there [as well].

How do you keep your style so diverse?
I love to travel and my style and life reflect that. Tanzania is my favorite place to go, and I work with my family on a number of projects around the continent of Africa. Also, I freelance for a new London-based magazine, Inspired Flight. Stops in Europe en route to Africa help me stay open to different looks and ideas... and in touch with my close friends. ×××

HOT AND BOTHERED

AS IF DATING weren't confusing enough, the Gloucester Stage Company complicates things further with Neil Simon's 1969 comedy Last of the Red Hot Lovers. The play follows a married restaurateur who's trying to spice up his humdrum existence during the sexual revolution. In a twist on the classic love triangle (or in this case, square), American Repertory Theatre alum Karen MacDonald portrays all three women the male protagonist tries to seduce in his mother's apartment. The company's production, featuring Ken Baltin as the would-be adulterer, begins July 2.

SAMANTHA LEAR

Last of the Red Hot Lovers runs July 2–19 at the Gloucester Stage. $32–$37. 267 East Main St., Gloucester. (978-281-4433) gloucesterstage.org. See Web site for schedule.

The Finish Line

Night Out at the Museum

It's not every city that has multiple talented teams and players. So once a year we pay our respects. The Sports Museum's annual summer fundraiser, the Tradition, gathers stars and legends—and honors the heck out of them and their achievements. Some of those gracing the Garden on June 24 include Troy Brown, Curt Schilling and Nancy Kerrigan. All proceeds from the gala and reception benefit the museum, which means the history of Boston athletics isn't all in the hands of the hotshots. It's in your cocktail glasses.

Duck à la Mamet

Filling the Bill

David Mamet doesn't do schmaltz. Had he helmed The Bucket List, Jack Nicholson probably would've wandered the globe with a directory of people who had betrayed him. So even though his play The Duck Variations centers on two elderly men trading observations about waterfowls, Mamet's sharp sense of irony favors humor over sentimentality. See The Duck Variations at the Zero Arrow Theatre as a Mamet double bill with Sexual Perversity in Chicago through June 28.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

Angels & Demons ★ Are these Dan Brown books as stupid as the movies they've spawned? I guess you can call Angels & Demons a step up from 2006's unspeakably turgid The Da Vinci Code, if only because it's more frantic and unhinged than that burnished, lethargic yak-fest. This boondoggle begins with a time bomb full of anti-matter (yes, kids, "anti-matter") stashed somewhere in Vatican City, and things only get more preposterous from there. Late game developments in this picture provoked peals of laughter the likes of which I've seldom heard at comedies. I daresay it's Ron Howard's funniest film since Splash. Tom Hanks reprises his role as surly Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon, with his charisma tamped down flatter than his unfortunate hairstyle. He wanders around pointing at statues and mumbling obscure art history footnotes while everyone else marvels at his intellectual prowess. Howard cranks up the Gregorian chant and keeps the lighting dim and the mood glum, but the material's inherent silliness throws the ponderous self-seriousness into sharp comic relief. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Brothers Bloom ★★ ½ Despite fine performances and good intentions, writer/director Rian Johnson's sophomore effort suffers from a fatal case of the cutes. It does, however, earn credit for exploring the gray areas between good storytelling and bad grifting, wondering aloud whether sometimes the right kind of lie can be helpful, even therapeutic. Adrien Brody and Mark Ruffalo star as the titular siblings, working globetrotting con games full of obscure literary references and heavy symbolism. A bored, shut-in heiress (Rachel Weisz) could be either their latest mark or their newest partner, and the movie keeps you wondering for longer than perhaps necessary. The snazzy couture, snarky music cues, slow-motion interludes and widescreen compositions suggest that Johnson has been watching too many Wes Anderson flicks. For a movie so concerned with the space between illusion and reality, a more grounded, less whimsical approach would have sufficed. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Drag Me to Hell ★★★ Taking a breather from his Spider-Man tent poles, Sam Raimi returns to his Evil Dead roots with this high-spirited goof that's about as classy and sophisticated as the title would lead you to believe. Good sport Alison Lohman stars as a perky young banker who makes the mistake of denying a mortgage extension to a gypsy witch doctor. Faster than you can say "ancient curse," Raimi is off and running with dizzying corkscrew camera moves, shrieking sound effects and a cheerfully sophomoric procession of gross-outs. At times, Raimi, who penned the script with his brother Ivan, seems to be having a private contest to see how many icky fluids, flies and eyeballs he can land in Lohman's mouth. Lately, horror movies have become so downbeat and nasty that the exuberant showmanship here lends a pleasingly retro vibe. Drag Me has the cheeky, morality play spirit of Tales From the Crypt and an ending that's just about perfect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Duplicity ★★★ ½ Tony Gilroy's sophomore feature is so breezy with classic Hollywood charm, one might not even notice how cynical it is. Clive Owen stars as an MI6 sellout who ditched Her Majesty's secret service for a more lucrative career spying on frozen-pizza patent disputes. He's got a bad history with Julia Roberts' CIA bombshell, and Gilroy's film rather ingeniously eliminates any real-world stakes in setting these two working at cross-purposes for vainglorious lotion CEOs played by Tom Wilkinson and the amazing Paul Giamatti. Or are they up to something else entirely? Leapfrogging back and forth through time, Duplicity is a tricky, sophisticated affair that demands your undivided attention. The giddiness comes from the pleasure these actors take in Gilroy's dialogue, whether it's his rapid-fire banter or some juicy sidewinding monologues. Telling lies for a living takes a toll, and Duplicity asks: How do you love someone after you've discovered they're as full of crap as you are? (In the suburbs.)

Easy Virtue ★★ Director Stephan Elliott's supremely annoying version of Noël Coward's 1926 play feels like two hours of being poked in the ribs by somebody who desperately wants to make sure you understand just how funny everything is. Poor Jessica Biel flounders way out of her league as a sophisticated American racecar driver who suffers the misfortune of marrying into a family of miserable English harpies. Kristin Scott Thomas costars as the brutal matriarch, trading insults with Colin Firth's depressed WWI veteran dad. Shrewish sisters Kimberley Nixon and Katherine Parkinson have plenty of put-downs of their own, while Biel's chinless hubby (Ben Barnes)

STAY AWAY

Sam Mendes continues his cynical takedown of suburbia.

Away We Go
★½
Starring Maya Rudolph, John Krasinski, Allison Janney, Jim Gaffigan, Maggie Gyllenhaal and Jeff Daniels. Written by Dave Eggers and Vendela Vida. Directed by Sam Mendes. At Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner Theatre and West Newton Cinema.

Teresa Isasi

IF YOU SMELL SOMETHING strange in your cinema, it's probably the stink of self-satisfaction wafting off Away We Go, a cutsey-poo ode to generational entitlement that will satisfy only those viewers who thought Juno wasn't smug enough.

Scripted by power-couple Dave Eggers and Vendela Vida, the film stars Newton's own John Krasinski and SNL-vet Maya Rudolph as Burt and Verona, a cloying couple in their mid-30s who can't heat their apartment properly, yet seem to think bringing a child into the world is a good idea.

Verona makes a living sketching medical anomalies, while Burt sells insurance over the phone in an affected, Casey Kasem accent. Somehow, such dubious career choices have granted these characters unlimited financial resources, so they can afford to travel across the country (and Canada) visiting other parents to ostensibly figure out what sort of family they should use as role models.

What follows is a cavalcade of grotesques. The film is basically a collection of broadly played comedy sketches designed to flatter not just Burt and Verona, but the audience as well. Because if we're enjoying the comedy, then we must also share the protagonists' refined sensibilities and natural-born superiority over the rest of the cretins onscreen. Away We Go is my least favorite kind of movie: the kind in which nothing is learned from other people, no common humanity is shared. There's just a succession of shallow arguments for a sad, myopic worldview established at the outset and unchallenged through to the end credits.

The first stop is Burt's parents, a couple of self-absorbed rubes played by Catherine O'Hara and Jeff Daniels as if they're auditioning for Christopher Guest's next movie. We're asked to believe that these folks care so little about their offspring that they've planned to move to Belgium a month before their grandchild is born, and Away We Go mines this bizarre parental negligence for queasy, atonal laughs.

But things don't get truly hateful until we arrive in Phoenix, where the couple visits Verona's former boss, a freakishly tanned harridan played in a rare, terrible performance by Allison Janney. She's boozy, shrill and bulldozes her henpecked, Red State–stereotype husband (Jim Gaffigan) with inappropriate sexual comments and reckless criticisms of her dim, obese children. Director Sam Mendes has been here many times before, having taken similarly cheap potshots at suburbia in both American Beauty and last year's excruciating Revolutionary Road. You can't help but wonder if this suburbia-phobia is an issue he might be better off discussing with a therapist.

But Eggers and Vendela's script is equal-opportunity in its offenses, and things move to the far left of the political landscape during a visit with Burt's hippie cousin Ellen, who embodies every cartoonish notion of an annoying women's studies professor, only broader and less realistic. Poor Maggie Gyllenhaal gets stuck breastfeeding onscreen while spouting monologues about the psychological villainy of strollers. Her character exists only to be humiliated by Krasinski during a deeply awkward scene that's designed as a farce but plays a lot more like bullying.

Away We Go asks us to bask in the superiority of this central super-couple. And yet, it's hard to figure out what makes them so goddamn special. For starters, they don't seem to like each other very much. She's detached and aloof, coasting through the film with an expression of mild disdain. Krasinski tries to cover up his bland, TV handsomeness with Woody Allen's old army jacket and a pair of thick-rimmed glasses. But he can't hide the air of privilege behind his mugging. Recent seasons of The Office have brilliantly punctured Krasinski's big fish in a small pond posturing, but such a feat requires the objectivity that Away We Go sorely lacks.

Mendes is a theater vet best known for his turgid Oscar-baiting adaptations, and Away We Go is his attempt to loosen up and go indie. But you can't teach an old dog new tricks, and the actors' calculated poses are no less phony than the labored period tableau of Revolutionary Road, even if the fashions are more Urban Outfitters than Mad Men. I swear, if I see one more "soulful" shot of a character sitting still, staring blankly into the camera to twee acoustic guitar music, I'm going to travel back in time and kill Zach Braff before Garden State ever happens.

It's fair to reveal that Burt and Verona's ideal home is someplace where they can be alone and perfect together, free from the rest of us pesky people and all our awful idiosyncrasies. Good riddance, I say. ✖✖✖ simply shrugs and leaves her to the wolves. It's a shame that Elliott has no faith in the source material, as he constantly undercuts Coward's elegant prose with kooky camera angles and obnoxious, anachronistic soundtrack selections like "Car Wash." You end up wishing the movie would just leave you alone. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square, and in the suburbs.)

Every Little Step ★ ½ Reality television's worst tendencies have been steadily creeping into theatrical documentaries. This puzzlingly acclaimed feature purports to part the curtains and take us backstage for the recent Broadway revival of A Chorus Line, but the movie trivializes the entire process, treating the production like the season finale of Dancing With the Stars. After a bit of early, intriguing archival footage chronicling the late-night improvisation sessions from which the late Michael Bennett culled the original 1975 production, Every Little Step pirouettes straight into the auditions. Veteran choreographer Bob Avian serves as a toothless Simon Cowell, overseeing an open casting call of more than 3,000 aspiring young talents, but still finding time to preen for the camera with maximum disingenuousness. Instead of exploring artistic decisions, the film focuses on shallow, puff-piece "profiles" of contestants—oops, I mean aspiring young professionals—and elimination rounds ensue. You'll be scanning the screen for phone numbers and instructions on how to vote for your favorites. (At Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

The Girlfriend Experience ★★★ Only the director of Sex, Lies and Videotape would cast a porn star in a movie about the economy. Billing itself as a portrait of a high-priced call girl (Sasha Grey, making her legit movie debut), the latest from the prolific Steven Soderbergh offers little of prurient interest but plenty to gnaw on. Pointedly set last October, at the height of the presidential race and when the bottom fell out of our financial system, The Girlfriend Experience works best as a snapshot of Manhattan in the throes of panicked uncertainty. Working in fragmented rhythms calling to mind 1960s Godard, Soderbergh depicts Grey's savvy escort as a blank slate, all the better to indict a New York culture in which every human interaction is just a business transaction. It's a cold picture that's deliberately slippery and unresolved. At times the movie feels as aloof as Grey's untrained lack of affect, but good luck getting it off your mind. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Hangover ★★★ This summer's out-of-nowhere blockbuster boasts a can't-miss premise: after a bachelor party gone wrong, three addled buddies wake up to a sea of Las Vegas sleaze, with no idea what happened to the groom. A bleary-eyed detective story follows, as these staggering malcontents attempt to piece together the previous evening. Director Todd Phillips, who helmed the similar man-child favorite Old School, still hasn't mastered the pacing required for such screwball comedy, but his cast comes to the rescue. The Office's Ed Helms once again uses his outward dorkiness to conceal a deep-seated anger, and star Bradley Cooper can't help but bring an unpleasant aggression to a character presumably intended to be much more endearing. The off-kilter energy is hammered home by alt-comedy icon Zach Galifianakis, who steals every scene not nailed down with his deadpan, wildly inappropriate reactions and perverted asides. The movie isn't always as funny as it likes to think it is, but this trio makes it feel dangerous. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Monsters Vs. Aliens ★★★ Like a snarky little offshoot of Pixar's crew of bona fide artistes, DreamWorks Animation tends to specialize in pop-culture references and dated inside jokes aimed at the long-suffering parents in the audience. Its latest endeavor will never be confused with Wall-E, but at least it's a cohesive piece that boasts a charmingly 50s' retro sensibility and some dazzling 3-D effects. Reese Witherspoon voices an unlucky bride struck by a meteorite, now horrified to find herself growing seven stories tall and quarantined in a secret government facility with a bunch of icky monsters. Once aliens attack, these outcasts become America's last line of defense. There's some very funny voice work by Hugh Laurie as the world's smartest cockroach, while Seth Rogen is typecast as an amorphous, dimwitted blob. As was bound to happen sooner or later, Stephen Colbert plays the president. See the IMAX 3-D presentation, which distracts from any screenwriting weaknesses with a healthy dose of eye candy. (In the suburbs.)

The Soloist ★★ Robert Downey Jr. stars as L.A. Times columnist Steve Lopez, a motor-mouthed depressive who befriends a homeless, schizophrenic musical prodigy, played by Jamie Foxx. Lopez writes an inexplicably popular series of columns, congratulating himself for befriending Foxx's babbling musician. This scores him a book deal and some journalism awards, but poor Foxx is still out on the street, mumbling to himself and playing Beethoven on a broken violin. Susannah Grant's screenplay spends a moment or two wondering how much of this "friendship" is really opportunistic exploitation on Lopez's part, but the movie is too cowardly to stay there for very long. The Soloist moves about in a muddle, never quite sure of what story it's supposed to be telling. Flashbacks to Foxx's traumatic childhood and mental breakdown are interlaced with mundane details about Downey's broken marriage, until it becomes one of those movies where the minority figure's tragic fall is just another way for the callous white guy to learn important life lessons. (In the suburbs.)

Star Trek ★★★ ½ What a wonderful surprise. It takes serious gall to recast characters as iconic as Captain Kirk and Mr. Spock with fresh-faced barely-knowns. Sure, there's a shiny coat of CGI paint and everybody's impossibly good-looking, but director JJ Abrams has captured the upbeat sense of adventure that defined Gene Roddenberry's original 1960s' series. More so than any Trek project in decades, this one captures the camaraderie, the easy humor and, most important, the swagger that we associate with the headstrong Kirk and his logical, pointy-eared pal. Much like Casino Royale, Abrams' Star Trek finds ingenious ways to serve up familiar pleasures. Rare for a landscape dominated by dour popcorn blockbusters, this one isn't afraid to be fun. All the phaser battles, sexy green girls and transporter beam antics you'd expect are present, just with slightly unexpected spins. The film's rousing finale ends with the Enterprise crew at last assembled and warping off to what we can only hope will be a happy series of sequels. May they live long and prosper. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

State of Play ★★ ½ Russell Crowe's goofy, game performance is the best reason to see this so-so Beltway thriller, which was awkwardly condensed from a six-hour BBC miniseries by director Kevin Macdonald. Crowe stars as a scruffy, hard-drinking reporter for a struggling D.C. daily, and he has a grand time selling the more preposterous aspects of the picture. It seems the mistress of Ben Affleck's rising-star congressman committed suicide, or was she perhaps murdered by a Blackwater-esque corporation Affleck's investigating? The film cruises along at an agreeable pace, piling on a few unsurprising plot twists and developments with the brisk efficiency of an airport paperback. Will anybody really wonder if this mess is going to somehow involve that homeless guy we saw executed over a mysterious briefcase during the opening credits? Or what about when an actor as famous as Jeff Daniels is hanging around in background without much to do for an hour? Do you think he might be involved? (In the suburbs.)

Sugar ★★★ ½ Gorgeous and understated, the latest film from Half Nelson writer/directors Anna Boden and Ryan Fleck follows Miguel "Sugar" Santos (Algenis Perez Soto), a promising pitcher from the Dominican Republic who finds himself ground in the gears of Major League Baseball's recruiting system. Avoiding what we've come to expect from a typical sports movie, Sugar has no interest in clichéd climaxes like a ninth-inning strikeout. It's a film about the day-to-day mechanics of a sports industry and what it feels like to be an outsider in America. With a tenuous grasp on the English language, Sugar and his teammates find themselves dropped in a small baseball-crazy town in Iowa, and the inevitable culture clash is rendered with uncommon sensitivity. In fact, my one quibble with Sugar is that the film may be a bit too sensitive. This is such a gentle, compassionate picture, a little crassness may have given it more dramatic punch. But how often does one complain that a movie is too thoughtful? (In the suburbs.)

Summer Hours ★★★ ½ French writer/director Olivier Assayas often suffers from a pedantic streak a mile wide. But this quiet, devastating family drama plays to his strengths, with three squabbling siblings sorting out what to do with their late mother's estate. Playing the heart-sick eldest, Charles Berling attempts to keep the family's posh country compound intact as a refuge for future generations, while younger Juliette Binoche and Jeremie Renier just want to cash in and move on with their cosmopolitan lives. Assayas pays as much attention to the objects in the frame as he does to these characters, as he lavishes furniture or the artwork on the walls with symbolic importance. Saying a lot, but never out loud, the film allows the dispersal and auction of these material things to stand in for the dissolution of a family over time. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Taking of Pelham 123 ★★ Director Tony Scott's pointless remake of Joseph Sargent's 1974 classic keeps the basic premise, as a scenery-chewing John Travolta hijacks a Manhattan subway car, much to the chagrin of Denzel Washington's weary, everyman dispatcher. But this slick redux misplaces the attitude, which is everything. The original wasn't much of a nail-biter but still remains a cherished cult favorite thanks to its time-capsule vision of a crumbling, battle-weary New York City. Scott's hyperactive version employs web cams, Wi-Fi gadgets, freeze frames and swooping helicopter shots of overwrought car crashes to oversell a story that was already foolproof. Only James Gandolfini, playing a disgraced mayor waiting out the end of his term, musters a level of droll cynicism that matches the previous picture. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Terminator Salvation ★ At least now we know why Christian Bale was so angry. A scant 25 years after James Cameron's low-budget thriller made a superstar out of California's future governor, a hack director who preposterously insists on calling himself McG has at last run the franchise into the ground. Bale barks a single, repetitive note as John Connor, humanity's humorless savior, who, thanks to time travel's pretzel logic, must rescue his teenage father (Anton Yelchin) from a lot of noisy, clanking robots and some patently offensive Holocaust allusions. There's also much ado about a befuddled cyborg, blandly played by Sam Worthington, who seems as confused as we are as to what purpose his character serves. Lacking a clear antagonist or any discernable reason to exist, Terminator Salvation suffers from a parched, ugly color palette and offers no relief from the grim funeral tone. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Up ★★★★ The geniuses at Pixar Animation Studios have done it again. This tall tale of an aging widower (voiced by Ed Asner) flying his house to South America with helium balloons has no right to be so emotionally powerful, but writer/director Pete Docter weighs down the bizarre flights of fancy with sharp human sadness. Somehow the movie manages to include a 13-foot female bird named Kevin, an army of talking dogs and some spectacular action sequences while never losing sight of the moving human drama. Breathtakingly animated, Up has more strange and beautiful images than can possibly be listed here, but perhaps none more so than the crumbling old home, born aloft by thousands of brilliantly colored balloons. It's a ridiculous conceit that pays off rich metaphorical dividends, as our protagonist must learn that it's time to let go. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

X-Men Origins: Wolverine ★ After an acrimonious split with series director Bryan Singer following 2003's nifty X2: X-Men United, 20th Century Fox seemed lost on how to proceed with their superhero franchise. First X3: The Last Stand scrapped Singer's carefully developed allegories of alienation and killed off the most interesting characters, and now Wolverine seeks to demystify the tragic history of Hugh Jackman's cigar-chomping scene-stealer. As far as revelations go, the movie doesn't offer much that wasn't already covered in X2. The only surprises here are the dour mood, shoddy special effects and complete absence of levity. Directed by Gavin Hood, who recently helmed the rancid war on terror melodrama Rendition, Wolverine takes itself remarkably seriously for a movie about a man with knives coming out of his knuckles. It's a somber affair, and Jackman is forced to tamp down the character's roguish Han Solo charms in favor of a lot of brooding, scowling and howling upward into clichéd overhead shots. No more of these, please. (In the suburbs.)

Breaking All the Rules

The Rebels of Film

Along with peace signs, drugs and protests, the 1960s also spawned a new breed of American cinema: the independents. These films challenged both societal and cinematic taboos—and made conservatives cringe while eating their popcorn. The Brattle Theatre pays tribute to this maverick genre in its upcoming Repertory Series starting June 26, The American Independents: The Dawn of New Hollywood. The series features the beloved classic Bonnie & Clyde, the rebellious tale that follows two lovers as they rob banks and woo the audience with their audacity and charm.

IN THE KEY OF ME

Marco Benevento blurs sound and genre with atmospheric keyboard stylings.

Marco Benevento Trio plays the Museum of Fine Arts' Calderwood Courtyard on July 1.

THE SAME WEEKEND AS Bonnaroo, Marco Benevento was driving to a Vermont jazz festival to play with his trio. But the keyboardist was thinking of his own Bonnaroo moment a few years earlier, when he and longtime drum partner Joe Russo played the Grateful Dead chestnut "Casey Jones" with guitarist Trey Anastasio and bassist Mike Gordon, both of Phish, and Dead bassist Phil Lesh.

"It was this epic moment with 80,000 people throwing glowsticks at us, Bonnaroo was sold out, and we could barely hear what we were doing. It was just insane," Benevento recalls. "I can't say the same is true on the other side with the trio. It's just smaller in general."

Smaller in scale perhaps, but no smaller in musical vision, critical acclaim or even classic-rock affection.

Benevento's second trio CD, Me Not Me, mixes originals with instrumental covers of My Morning Jacket's "Golden" and Led Zeppelin's "Friends" as well as obscure tunes from Leonard Cohen, Beck and George Harrison. "Those are the songs that resonate with me the most," he says of his selections, "and when I sat down at the piano and played them, they worked."

The piano serves as his main tool in the trio, much like the Hammond organ in the Benevento-Russo Duo. But in either case, he enjoys augmenting his keyboard with effects and loops.

"Over the last 10 years, I've gone full circle, going back to playing more piano," says Benevento, a 1999 graduate of Berklee College of Music, where pianist Joanne Brackeen's "coach-like teaching" honed his jazz skills. "But the thing that carried over [from the Duo] is some of those effects and how to use them in a live setting. I want delay on my piano, and I want to affect the delay while I'm playing."

To that end, Benevento plugs his acoustic piano into an amp via guitar pickups, and lines the top of the instrument with effect pedals and even plastic "circuit-bent" toys, devices that are rewired with toggle switches or pitch knobs to elicit warped lo-fi sounds. "They're cool for intros and outros, and maybe middle sections," he says. "You've got to manipulate them and not overdo them."

In turn, Benevento cuts through his decorative clouds with clear melodies. "Probably my attraction to all the [cover] songs is the melody," he says from his Brooklyn home. "My way of interpreting that is putting my colors around it."

He finds those colors in the archaic keyboards and effects that fill his home studio, dressing up his piano, the bass of Reed Mathis and the drums of Matt Chamberlain or Andrew Barr. Then he shuffles trio mates for the road. "I'm cool with changing it up," says Benevento, who hits the Museum of Fine Arts on July 1 with bassist Marc Friedman (who plays in the Boston trio the Slip) and drummer Josh Raymer from the Jacob Fred Jazz Odyssey. "It keeps it fresh for me."

Benevento, 31, first reveled in the freshness and diversity of music in his New Jersey childhood. His immigrant father sang Italian songs, his uncle played guitar, and the house was filled with the sounds of Motown, Billy Joel and the Beatles. "I was raised with music being entertaining," says Benevento, who began playing piano at age 5. "My dad would whistle a melody and I'd try to figure out the chords."

Then he discovered jazz at age 15, soaking in the keyboard work of Oscar Peterson, Jimmy Smith and Larry Young, whose gritty organ sound with the Tony Williams Lifetime provided particular inspiration. He also cites a post-Berklee lesson with jazz pianist Brad Mehldau, whose rock-textured 2002 CD Largo (featuring drummer Chamberlain) served as a spiritual blueprint for Benevento's trio.

"I was there about six hours, all day, eating lunch and playing Brahms and original music, and he said, 'Check this out,' and it was the rough mixes of Largo," Benevento says. "I immediately felt so much more comfortable at his house. I was like, 'Yeah, I knew it,' and we started talking about Led Zeppelin and Rush and all this rock [stuff]."

Indeed, in addition to the trio, the Benevento-Russo Duo (also recording this year with plans to tour in November) and Stanton Moore's funky Garage a Trois, Benevento plays with two cover bands: the Zeppelin vehicle Bustle in Your Hedgerow and Quartet the Killer, which tackles Neil Young.

"I like to keep myself super-busy with different bands," he says. "I'm a little ADD in the music department." ✖✖✖

Bare Necessities

Lady Sings the Blues Watch one episode of American Idol, and you're sure to witness some fresh-faced female singer desperately trying to emulate Billie Holiday's legendary vocal style. Then there's Madeleine Peyroux. Since Peyroux arrived on the scene more than 13 years ago, she's made her mark with a sound many say is naturally reminiscent of Ms. Holiday. A critical darling (the BBC Jazz Awards named her "Best International Jazz Artist" in 2007), she's a former busker who frequently covers tunes by the likes of Leonard Cohen, Joni Mitchell and Tom Waits. Her recently released fourth CD, Bare Bones, shows the same smooth vocals but with a stripped-down feel. The album's tracks are all originals, written or cowritten by the musician herself, and they pack a lot of emotion into a frame of elegant lyrics. This is jazz singing at its most polished and songwriting at its most evolved. Hear Peyroux in person at the Berklee Performance Center on June 28.

Beatle Blasphemy

Sinking the Yellow Submarine

Many critics consider the Beatles the world's greatest band. Elijah Wald, not so much. In How the Beatles Destroyed Rock 'n' Roll, Wald rejects conventional wisdom and argues that the Fab Four's fame had a detrimental influence on pop music. Join the author for a discussion of his deviant views on June 30 at Porter Square Books.

IMPROPER Sightings!

BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER COOKING UNDER THE NAME "FRANK COSTANZA" AT THE ANNUAL NATIONAL BARBECUE BATTLE HELD JUNE 27–28 IN WASHINGTON, D.C

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

John Mapili and Robert Prezioso saw the United Buddy Bears Exhibition in Buenos Aires as the perfect time to experiment with the "LSD" function on their new digital camera.

Michelle Pattinson enjoyed a stogie break in the Bahamas with a statue of Captain Tan Khakis—an infamous Bahamian pirate/championship boxer, best known for his killer right hook.

Melissa Blom and Andrea Alpert-Bus took a spin down Wyoming's Snake River. But they were never in any danger, since the river had swallowed three mice earlier that afternoon.

New York Congressman Dan Maffei is a man who appreciates grammar. But he'll be dead in the cold, cold ground before he recognizes that "i before e" nonsense.

NEIGH SAYERS

Justin Mills and Sam Mendoza

Who Wore It Better? ▲

You decide. Puckish fashion designer Sam Mendoza? Or PR twinky Justin Mills of the Achilles Project? They both showed up at the Cynthia Rowley fashion show at the Liberty Hotel wearing white V-neck T-shirts and the same sweater. Cast your vote at editor@improper.com, and the winner will get an Improper Bostonian T-shirt, which will look cute under the sweater. And the first reader to guess the label on the sweater will get an Improper T, too, so he or she can be all matchy-matchy with whichever one of them wins.

Where Was Mr. Ed?

A stable of thoroughbreds turned out at Jacob Wirth for Save the Boston Mounted Park Rangers' Horses (their budget's been axed and the mounts were being put out to pasture).

There was booze and food and some excellent music from Felix Brown, plus the opportunity to mingle with the likes of presidential grandson and tall-drink-of-water Jack Roosevelt, international man of mystery Christian Bailey, gorgeous organizer Julia Owens and the unfairly handsome Michael Raymo (who's in the band), Chestnut Hillions Lee and Cokie Perry, Beacon Hellcat Joan Jolley, the doyenne of Cape Elizabeth, Julie Sprague, her stunning daughter Julie Hume Gordon accompanied by her husband, Phil, and best friend from high school, Jake Anderson, who tried to stir up mischief by saying, "A hundred bucks to anyone who gets the service revolver off that ranger."

The evening was a smashing success. The horses were kept in feed for the foreseeable future, and some of their veterinary costs were covered, including free dental exams, which prompted the following conversation: "Where do I sign up?"

"I know! Why don't they set up college scholarships while they're at it?"

Ain't It Good to Know

In terms of popularity, the Boys and Girls Clubs could be the prettiest girl in ninth grade, judging by the Friends Council launch party held in the Foundation Room at the House of Blues.

Among the cool kids on hand were cochair Ashley Wisneski, donut heir James Rosenberg and the lovely Jennifer, salty dog Peter Creighton and the equally drenched Ian Watson, gem peddler Cedric Tonello of Cartier, the delightful Mark and Erin Epker, pixieish babe Caitlin Crowe, NFL scion Josh Kraft, and human graham crackers Elizabeth and John Carroll.

Two of the funniest exchanges of the evening involved guests poking fun at their fathers.

"If you want to see a human sundial, just come to Nantucket and watch my father getting a tan," said one, while another observed, "I refer to my dad as an avid indoorsman."

Those Ballet Lessons DO Come in Handy

Overheard leaving a cocktail party to benefit Planned Parenthood at a home on Beacon Hill: A woman (with a few glasses of wine in her) was asked how she could walk down the steep cobblestone street in such high heels. "Simple," she said. "You just stay on demi-pointe."

Drool Becomes Her

The most recession-appropriate fundraiser we've heard of (and, frankly, a stroke of genius) was Consignment for a Cure, a benefit for Dana-Farber that turned the ballroom of the Park Plaza into a bargain basement chockablock with gently used (and brand new) but drastically reduced high-end stuff.

The socially responsible could unleash their inner shopaholic without guilt, knowing that their money would go to the twoAM Fund (aimed at wiping out women's cancers).

Among the smart cookies wearing the numbers off their credit cards: organizers Karen Webster and Cynthia Wachs, blonde bombshell Meredith Beaton Starr, the ubiquitous Tonya Chen Mezrich, brunette cutie pie Julie Novakoff, the flawless Amy Fisher, Wellesley fashionista Sari Brown, personal shopper Susan Slosberg and one woman who said, "Nice to meet you. Now I've got to go shop. I'm salivating." ✖✖✖

Avez-vous dish? Dirt? A spectacular social occasion? Call JS at 617-859-1400, ext. 303, or send an e-mail to jonathan@improper.com.

How do we make a menthol cigarette without adding anything to the tobacco? Simple. We put crystal granules into the filter that are infused with natural menthol. All you're burning is 100% additive-free tobacco, so you get the consistently fresh, menthol taste you want, while smoking the best premium natural tobacco found only in Natural American Spirit.

Our Green pack gives you a full-bodied menthol taste, and our Green & White pack gives you a light, mellow menthol taste.

SPECIALIZING IN RESTAURANT INSURANCE SINCE 1981

OUR OBJECTIVES:

- Reduce your insurance costs and gaps in coverage
- Analyze your insurance requirements first from the viewpoint of risk management

TESTIMONIALS:

MANTRA MANTRA 52 Temple Place, Boston

"Having worked with Dadgar Insurance and its President, Anowsh Dadgar, for 10 plus years, I can confidently say that it is the best agency for restaurant insurance in the business. His expertise is especially evident when we have had small or large claims, as Dadgar deals with each claim swiftly and effectively. What a comfort to be in such experienced hands."

—Owner Amrik Pabla

THE ELEPHANT WALK THE ELEPHANT WALK 900 Beacon Street, Boston

"I have nothing but good things to say about Dadgar Insurance, from fitting policies to our needs and sourcing quality carriers at good prices to what I feel is extra-ordinary follow-up and active assistance when we have had to make a claim. Anowsh has acted as a partner in managing our risk rather than a salesman selling us a policy."

—General Manager Richard Pile

FuGaKyu FUGAKYU 1280 Beacon Street, Brookline

"Not only does Dadgar Insurance continually save Fugakyu thousands per year on our premium, they do so without compromising on coverage or quality. But what really keeps us with Anowsh? Dadgar is hands down the friendliest, most efficient and trustworthy agency with which we have dealt. See for yourself."

Top Ratings

When Sports Illustrated scribe Peter King moved to town in March, he took a break from football reporting to post the following online:

Memo to Starbucks: Have one of your muckety-mucks make it over to the South End Buttery... it's as good a latte as I've had in the United States.

Memo to Peter: The Buttery is only the beginning of Boston's charms. Flour, around the corner, has a brioche that will blow your mind.

Both businesses win our praises this issue. For the 18th year, we're honoring the city's finest—from bars and boutiques to galleries and restaurants. It's a major undertaking that involves judges, ballots, meetings, sweat, caffeine and a whole lotta interns.

So not just any cover subject will do. Who better than Brookline boy Conan O'Brien? We photographed the new host of The Tonight Show his first month on the job in California.

Yes, Conan left for tanner pastures. But I'll see you at Flour.

TWEET NOTHINGS

THERE'S BEEN much ado about Twitter this past year. Besides giving the world the unexpurgated thoughts of Ashton Kutcher, tweets have become a way for businesses to shill themselves in 140 characters (see twitter.com/theimproper). Tom O'Keefe has taken it upon himself to filter through the flotsam with Boston Tweet, a Twitter stream that forwards news on local events and entertainment promotions, while also hosting "tweetups" for people to meet in real life.

"It was a direct result of the economy," admits O'Keefe, who, as a single guy with a social bent, knew his way around the city's pubs. But he feared for their survival. "I wanted to create awareness for local businesses—bars, places to eat and drink and hear music."

A Boston College graduate, O'Keefe is a tech entrepreneur "who had a few start-ups, but they were junk." Although he's busy working with another one ("It's going to be very big."), he spends about 40 hours per week with Boston Tweet, updating it, retweeting events and carrying on conversations about, say, where to get a good iced coffee. "A lot of what I talk about is places that I like to go." And go he does. He's out seven nights a week. Immediacy, he says, is what makes Boston Tweet so useful.

Tweets "started as someone going for a run or something that's, who cares? Now it's a very powerful tool to broadcast news, as we're seeing in Iran."

Drink specials won't change the world, but O'Keefe has 7,000 followers as of this article. "When you focus on a niche, it becomes influential."

Drink of the Moment

Summer of the Southside

The story of the Southside depends on whether you prefer your legends urban or urbane. For those who like a little rough and tumble in the tumbler, it was invented on Chicago's South Side, by gangsters looking to mask their rotgut gin. If you still play tennis with a wooden racket, you'll favor the folklore that the cocktail was created for Long Island country clubbers, either for the Buchanans on the South Fork or the gentlemen at the Southside Sportsmen's Club.

Traditionally made of 2 oz. of gin with ¾ oz. of both lemon juice and simple syrup shaken with mint, the Southside is basically a Tom Collins minus the bubbles or must. It's like ordering a mojito without the feeling that you're falling into commercial lockstep. "The people drinking Aviations or Pegu Clubs aren't necessarily going to hop on the mojito bandwagon, but this is light, fresh and summery," bartender Scott Marshall explains. "And you can feel better about it because it's not as mainstream."

The ease of the formula makes the Southside both a perfect summer punch and a cocktail the home bartender can play with. Now slinging Southsides at Silvertone ($8) and Drink ($10), Marshall started its Boston resurgence at City Bar with the PC Southside ($11), featuring muddled mint with pomegranate juice and cucumber. With the inclusion of new fruits or herbs, it can become your own, and guests will believe whatever legend you provide if they want seconds. "I prefer the Chicago story," Marshall says. "I called it the PC Southside, so I could also say PC stood for Prohibition Chicago. I'm self-serving." NICK ALTSCHULLER

The New Roast Chicken

Here we go again. Just as he did with chicken, Gordon Hamersley has created a monstrous success out of seemingly ho-hum ingredients: An excuse to cook clams, bacon and veggies morphed into a halibut dish ($36) with cultlike appeal. The dense, white fish works well year-round, Hamersley explains, but like poultry, its unobtrusive taste needs a little kick in the pants. To that end, he seasons the filets with salt, pepper and cayenne before pan-roasting them with littlenecks, bacon, greens, black trumpet mushrooms and white beans. And for the first time, he's sharing the recipe. ELIZABETH BOMZE

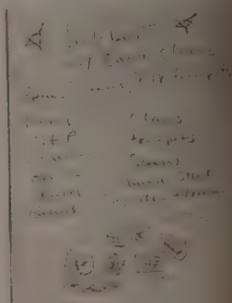
Recipe

Gordon Hamersley's Halibut and Clam Roast With Bacon-Braised Greens, Big White Beans and Black Trumpet Mushrooms

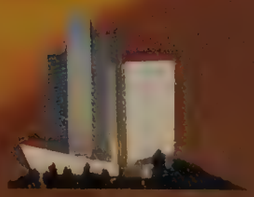
Serves 4

1–2 tablespoons vegetable oil
4 halibut filets, 5–6 ounces each
Pinch of kosher salt
Pinch of white pepper
Pinch of cayenne pepper
½ white onion, thinly sliced
3 ounces smoked bacon, cut crosswise into ¼-inch sticks
8 littleneck clams, washed
4 ounces black trumpet mushrooms, cut thinly
1 cup greens (escarole, red leaf, green leaf), washed and dried
1½ cups large white beans (jarred cannellini work well)
½ cup white wine
½ cup fish or clam stock
3 tablespoons unsalted butter, cut into small pieces
Lemon juice to taste

Preheat oven to 375 degrees.



Heat the vegetable oil in 1 or 2 saute pans over high heat until hot. Salt and pepper the halibut and add a pinch of cayenne to each filet. Brown on one side for about 3 minutes. Turn filets and discard the excess oil.



Add the onion, bacon and clams. Place the pan in the oven, about 6 minutes or until almost cooked.

Remove fish to a warm platter. The clams will likely need a bit more cooking. Add the mushrooms, greens, white beans, white wine and stock to the pan. Bring to a boil and cook until the clams open and the liquid reduces by about half.

When the clams are cooked, add the butter and whisk until incorporated into the liquid. Add the lemon juice to taste.

Place the halibut filets on plates and top with the clams and sauce.

GET THE DRIFT

The spot that formerly housed the B-Side Lounge is reopening in mid-July as Lord Hobo, and locals can't decide whether to wring or clap their hands. Though the B-Side became a cocktail institution on its quiet corner in Cambridge, many residents were happy to see it go. Nightlife purists want to know who the new guy thinks he is.

"Any time you open a famous place, there's going to be hurdles," says Daniel Lanigan, a 33-year-old with a soft voice and a loud goatee, looking no worse for the wear after being run through the industry and Internet rumor mills. "No one is going to put more pressure on me than I do myself. My expectations for a great bar are going to be higher than everyone else's. The rest is par for the course." When people question his presumption, he's quick to remind them that the space was up for auction. (At least your favorite old haunt isn't a new Arby's.) And Lanigan—who's also the new owner of the Other Side Café—has built a reputation with his two well-regarded beer bars in Western Mass.

With a historic location and a formula built on "the big three" of superior cocktail, beer and wine lists, help wasn't hard to find. "We have pro cocktail guys from all over town who left their jobs to come here," Lanigan says. "It came together effortlessly. We've had our staff for a month, and we're not even open yet." And now at Monday staff tastings, the familiar faces responsible for drinks like the Monkey Business—brandy, Velvet Falernum and Weisse beer—convene over dishes created by former Teatro head chef Matt Bailey. Perhaps news of house-made gnocchi with braised duck will soothe anxious neighbors.

With an aesthetic of mahogany, steel and blood-red walls (a look Lanigan calls "new Viking"), Lord Hobo won't replicate the faded hip of the B-Side. But that's probably for the best. It's a young staff, a fresh start, and new bars, like new lovers, are never fairly served by comparison. NICK ALTSCHULLER

How to mind your manners

IN HER BOSTON GLOBE MAGAZINE column, Robin Abrahams provides sane, sensible, often lighthearted advice. Other times, Abrahams gives the questioner a frisky slap. Now in a new book, she roams philosophically over, around and under the situations that lead to quandaries of etiquette.

In one case, owners might see dogs as their babies, while Fido-fearers don't welcome them crashing parties. From the pet's perspective, a friendly pat from above may feel like "the Death Star swooping in on you." Abrahams advises that you squat at snout level to greet the canine and, "Don't make snarky comments about pets being 'child substitutes.'" Then there's money, a dungeon of irrationality that brings resentment-filled confusion about such things as how Ms. Rich and Mr. Poor should split the bill.

Miss Conduct's Mind Over Manners
by Robin Abrahams

The advice columnist talks etiquette.

Abrahams explores those complexities in a psychological, rather motherly spirit. The gracefully gracious person she inspires you to become balances the real and the ideal, compromising at times, setting boundaries at others, but without shouting, "I am Spartacus!" Cultivating curiosity and respect for the madcap varieties of religious, romantic and gender experiences keeps you flexible and open. ✖✖✖

MISSED CONNECTION

TO THE CUTE GUY AT THE GAY PRIDE BLOCK PARTY: We met on June 13. I was a bit shy [about giving] you my information, but you were super cute, and we had a great conversation. You grew up in Lincoln, your name is either Andrew or Anthony, and you work in the health care industry. You're a late 20-something Asian, and you wore a blue collarless T-shirt. I'm the Caucasian, brown-haired, brown-eyed boy working in biotech in Cambridge who tried to track you down to give you my contact info. Would love to hear from you at canalstreet2004@yahoo.com.

Missing you already

To the Happy Adulterers:

Congratulations! The divorce was this week, and in 90 days he's officially yours. I can't wait for your engagement announcement to hit the papers. I imagine it will read something like: "Desperate young girl lacking self-esteem is pleased to announce her engagement to older bankrupt loser with two young children and huge amounts of debt. In a story taken straight from the pages of a fairy tale, the second bride-to-be was elated when she met the married man of her dreams. The couple enjoyed a whirlwind courtship which began at their office and quickly led to the groom leaving his family and moving in with the second bride. The couple has been eagerly awaiting the groom's divorce and keeping busy by pretending they are not horrible people. They plan to continue residing together in the second bride's apartment until the groom is able to rebuild his credit enough to cosign a lease."

Good luck with all that.

Soon to be official (and ecstatic) ex-wife

To the Jerk at the Holocaust Memorial:

I was sitting down at the Holocaust Memorial in Boston near Haymarket, and you were making fun of the president. You said it to me because I was wearing a United States Navy shirt. I think it was very disrespectful of you to make fun of the president, especially to someone you don't even know.

HERE COMES THE NOCHE

... after Icarus goes dark.

WHEN ICARUS MELTS into a memory, Noche will fill its celebrated South End space with an upscale restaurant and lounge that's the latest project from Boston Nightlife Ventures, although it will be geared "toward food, not nightlife as much," according to BNV's Jeff Gauches. Specifically, late-night food: Noche will be open until 2 am, "and we're going to offer late-night dining," says Euz Azevedo, BNV's president.

Talks are underway with "a few high-profile chefs," and the design team's operative adjectives are "clean, modern, elegant, sophisticated, vibrant," but Azevedo says it's too early to discuss menu details or decor. Expect an opening date in late fall.

CHEF BRIAN POE'S current menu of "North and South American cuisine"—inspired by his travels through Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Peru and elsewhere—has resulted in a startling development at Poe's Kitchen at the Rattlesnake Bar & Grill. "Bean dip is now the slowest seller on the menu," Poe reports. No wonder, with dishes such as Southern Comfort–and-coffee-bean beef short-rib tamales, celery-root fish tacos, and chile relleno with cherry-infused goat cheese and pomegranate salsa.

CONSIDER IT PROOF that you can go Om again. Michael Madden, just named executive chef at Om in Harvard Square, was also chef de cuisine at the restaurant back in 2006 and acting chef in 2008, following the departure of Rachel Klein. Most recently, he worked with Klein at Aura at the Seaport Hotel.

IT'S NOT NEWS that Andy Husbands can take the heat; what's news is that he's going to Gordon Ramsay's Hell's Kitchen in season 6 of the reality show. Husbands is competing against a roster of other chefs to win Ramsay's favor. See the premiere July 21 at 8 pm on Fox.

CHILD'S PLAY

So your family has eight kids? Big whoop.

Ezra's mom and her sizable fam

IF YOU'RE A PARENT, NEARLY every waking hour is spent caring for your progeny. When, finally, they're sleeping or visiting a friend or out dynamiting tree stumps by lighting batteries on fire (maybe that was a childhood pastime unique to me), what are you going to do? I'd suggest engaging in an activity that's a respite from the daily routine. Drink Scotch, set up an illegal casino in the basement, light fireworks, see how fast your cars will go, wrestle a drifter, that kind of thing. What I wouldn't want to do is turn on the TV and watch other people raise their kids. And yet nearly 10 million viewers tuned in to the season 5 premiere of Jon and Kate Plus 8. Since all childless people are busy street-racing and taking ecstasy, I have to conclude that it's parents who are watching. What I don't understand is why.

Here's my problem with these shows: In other genres of reality TV, the subjects are chosen because they're in some way talented or interesting. (Allowing for the Kardashian-Pratt Clause, where people become famous for no discernible reason.) In the "whole mess o' kids" programs, the presumption seems to be that having lots of children automatically makes for interesting television. This is incorrect. Acting horribly dysfunctional makes for good television, but you don't need a lot of kids for that. At this point, Jon and Kate Plus the Skanks They Date would probably have better ratings than the show in its current format. Because if I just wanted to watch children fighting, I'd go to Chuck E. Cheese and yell, "Free Transformers in the bouncy castle!"

Back in the day, having enough kids to fill a basketball roster wasn't that remarkable. My mom was one of 10, so I asked her if there were any situations in her own multitudinous upbringing that would've made for good TV. "Well, there was the time my sister got drunk at age 4," she said. "The older kids got assigned to watch the younger kids, and I was watching her. But at some point she climbed up on the counter and drank a glass of wine that was sitting there. Later, I was trying to put her to bed and she said, 'I'm blind! I'm blind! I can't go to school!'

"Our family friend, Glenn, drove us to the hospital, where they realized my sister was drunk. They asked Glenn if he was the father, and he said no. Then my uncle showed up, and they asked if he was the father. Finally, the hospital got my father on the phone and asked him her date of birth, and he couldn't remember, so they didn't really believe he was the father, either. Your grandma said that with all those guys involved and a drunk kid, they probably thought she herself was a prostitute. It was funny." Come to think of it, maybe they should've had a reality show.

In the big-family genre, we've now got Jon and Kate Plus 8, 18 Kids and Counting and Table for 12. Octo-mom doesn't yet have a show, but I think we can assume that it's only a matter of time. There's a lot of potential in merging her program into an existing program for a new twist: Hogan Knows Octo-mom, The Girls Next Door to Octo-mom, Ice Road Octo-trucker. That might seem like a stretch, but I just turned on the TV to see Kate Gosselin hanging out in a hair salon with one of the guys from American Chopper. And that was exactly as exciting as it sounds.

Want more excitement? Here's an excerpt from Kate's blog: "The second day, we further discovered the world of seashells. They were amazing at this beach and Mady proudly showcased her sand dollar that she found.... By the end of the second day, each child had their own collection, and even I and my babysitter had started our own collections. It was ex-shell-ent fun!" Then she complains about the paparazzi. To recap, someone who feels the need to publicly chronicle her stupid seashell collecting is complaining about the same inexplicable public interest that fosters her career. Somebody might need to explain to her that the paparazzi don't tend to follow people who are well-adjusted. They follow people who are walking time bombs of rage and dysfunction, people who have a high probability of being caught on camera punching a puppy in the face.

So, Jon and Kate are getting divorced, and the show is on hiatus. Once resumed in August, it'll probably gain momentum when the kids meet their new mommy, Chyna, and their new daddy, Danny Bonaduce. My mom, for one, won't be watching. She doesn't need to—she lived it. "That Kate seems like a bitch," she said. "But I like the show with the little people." ×××

O'BRIEN TACKLES THE TONIGHT SHOW.

By Andrew Rimas
Photograph by Kerry Brett

WHEN CONAN O'BRIEN assumed the host's chair at The Tonight Show last month, some people felt afraid. Whither the surrealist bits, the jokes about sexual deviance, the characters like Pimpbot 5000? Surely, the wisdom went, Jay Leno made a career out of dishing up vanilla. O'Brien, 46, would either shock middlebrow tastes and alienate sponsors, or lower himself into pap.

A month into his captaincy of America's biggest variety show, he's done neither. Wearing his red pompadour like a Phrygian cap, he's still anarchic and self-deprecating, still airing reports from Triumph the Insult Comic Dog, still letting his audience think that the biggest joke of all is that he's been given the keys to the studio.

"Do I like it out here? Yeah, I like it out here," the Harvard grad tells us. "I just love what I do. I'd do it in Cleveland if I had to."

Even so, California hasn't melted the edge from our Brookline boy. In hopes that it never does, we invited two other Boston transplants—"trannie-fixated" comedians David and Chris Walsh—to give a fellow New Englander some advice on how to survive in his new, alien environment.

CONAN,

It is great News that you have decided to join us in Los Angeles. The Resistance can use another Young Man with a strong back and Dedicated spirit. Grab an avocado.

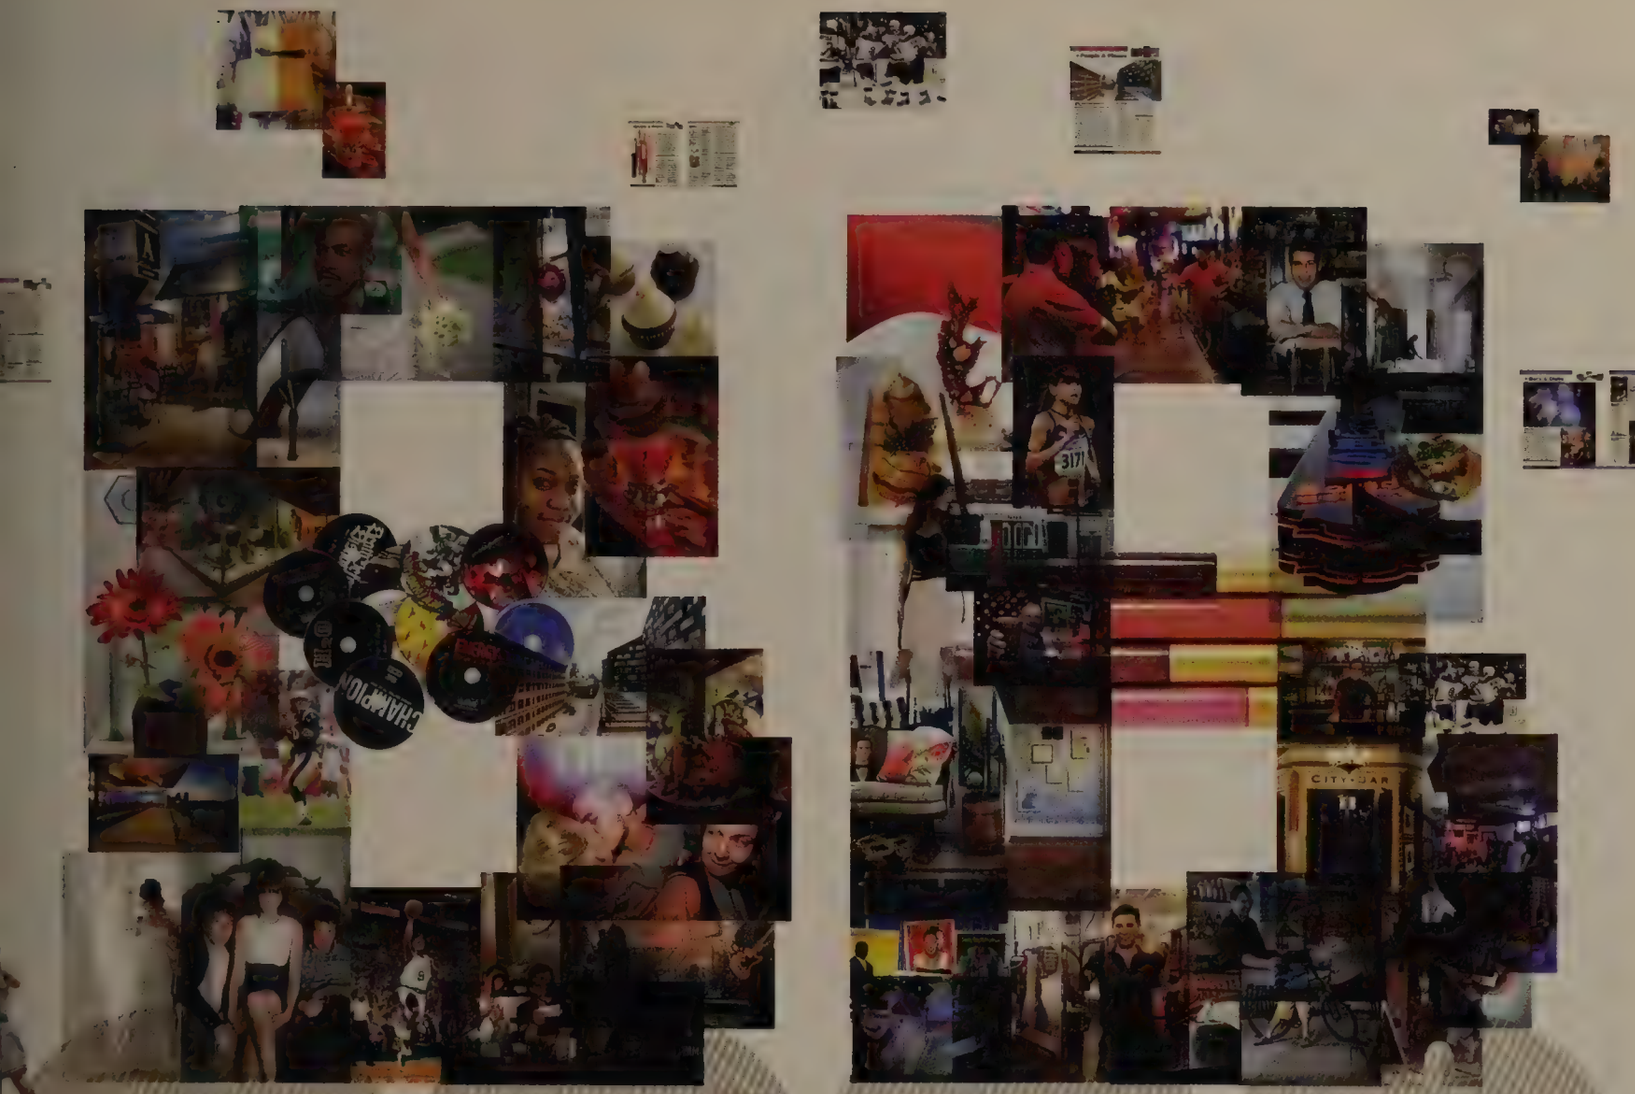
Let Us catch you up to Speed. We touched down One year and one half ago. Fires surrounded the City and vehicles were at a standstill on all roads. A Great Smog descended upon the metropolis and never lifted. We immediately went Underground.

The Underground is comprised of a Nation from the east. We use the Double Sox as a Symbol to identify each other. A couple of times during high Hot Season, we pack-travel to Anaheimland and pluck the Wings of Angels. It brings the Nation its only pleasure.

The rest of Existence is quite hellish. An Apocalyptic Curse befalls this City. When the Fires cease, vast Mudslides destroy the Hill people and their homes. The Earth Quakes randomly, keeping you Unstable and skittish. A Poisonous cloud called Great Smog blankets the Sky, distorting the disappearing Sun into colors of surprising Splendor.

The City is a Façade and nothing is what it Seems. Worlds constructed and disassembled for an Industry of Make-believe. Surgeons with Plastic build women, masking Emptiness with Beauty.

Be Advised that a Considerable danger stands in the Darkness. It is the Shapeshifter. A Being who Transforms instantly into another Gender. A Score of Times were we Fooled by its Attractive form.



Conan, your Arrival is Momentous. We hear You are a possessor of Humor and fine Wit—and of a Black Bear that stimulates its Own genitals. It is obvious you are Not of this strange Place.

The Underground welcomes you.

The Improper Bostonian

Boston's Best

WITH 401(K)S SHRUNKEN TO 201(k)s and companies shedding jobs like a compulsive changes underwear, a dollar has become a precious thing. Nowadays, it's a big deal to splurge on a filet au poivre, or a pair of pumps, or even a premium martini. So if you're sacrificing the cash, you want to get the best. Which doesn't mean the most expensive.

That's the driving philosophy behind this, our 18th annual Boston's Best issue, in which we applaud the city's outstanding bars, restaurants, shops and services. Momentary trends and fleeting status symbols don't make the cut. Only quality does, whether we find it in a glittering lounge that serves caviar or in an anonymous dive that smells of chicken wings.

And how do we conduct our exhaustive search? We start by passing the buck. As in the past, we invite the city's savviest style-makers and connoisseurs to a dinner party. This year, our host was the incomparable Grill 23, and our panel of judges consisted of luminaries from all walks of life—people like author Tom Perrotta and Zipcar CEO Scott Griffith (see photo on page 122).

After we corralled them in a private dining room and plied them with wine and a sumptuous meal, they hashed out the categories on our ballots, taking into account any potential conflicts of interest. Then the real work began.

With the help of our editorial staff and a team of dogged interns, we tallied the votes, injected our own expert opinions and determined the winners. We know you won't agree with all of them. But we hope you'll use this issue as a guide, secure in the knowledge that it represents the best.

BAKERY: CUPCAKES
Sweet

Cupcakes have had rival desserts licked for the past few years, and when Sweet launched in the Back Bay, Bostonians embraced the trend. With a second location in Cambridge, the whimsical bakery is as cute as the treats.

AMERICAN
Union Bar and Grille

No Applebee's here: Union does standard American fare proud. Creative twists enliven familiar dishes like roasted haddock with smoked shiitake mushrooms and red curry broth or grilled lamb chops with artichoke potato gratins and Mission fig jus. The swank dining room only adds to the classic meets contemporary vibe. It's also a great, affordable spot for brunch. Beware: The B-52 French toast is addictive.

BAKERY: BREADS
B&R Artisan Bread

Michael Rhoads ticks off a roster of his most prominent clients (B&G Oysters, T.W. Food, Wasik's Cheese Shop) as proof of his product's quality. Impressive but hardly necessary. Old fans of Sel de la Terre's award-winning bread basket and new patrons of Rhoads' Framingham boulangerie know that his sourdough speaks for itself.

BAKERY: PASTRIES
Flour Bakery and Cafe

As of press time, Joanne Chang's much-anticipated cookbook (due out in 2010) had hit the photography stage; the bakery's blog names pear and cranberry crostata, sticky sticky buns, mile-high lemon meringue pie and raspberry rhubarb muffins as beauty shot potentials. (And if we had our way, the lemon-ginger mousse she serves at nearby Myers + Chang would also make the cut.) In the meantime, her two sugar houses—and their loyal addicts—continue to enjoy sweet success, packing in crowds on weekend mornings.

BAR FOOD
Garden at the Cellar

It may have been the tater tots that started it all (don't worry, they're still on the menu), but it's the other nibbles that make this a great place to grab a stool. "Bar snacks" include chickpea fries and bacon-wrapped dates. The burger's there, but we recommend the falafel sandwich with spiced yogurt, mint, parsley and pickles. Whatever you order, it's sure to feature local ingredients, a Will Gilson hallmark.

BARBECUE
M&M Ribs

If eating out of the back of a truck sounds shady, you haven't tried the well-sauced stuff served by Big Moe at M&M Ribs. Chicken wings, collards and ribs are prepared from scratch in true tailgate style—the way barbecue should be and at prices most anyone can afford. For something a little less messy, go for the fried chicken. It packs more crunch than the colonel's and won't leave you with greasy fingers.

BISTRO
Petit Robert

Walk into Petit Robert, and you're sure to hear French—spoken not just by the waiters, but also by other diners. The next good sign is the menu, which has everything you'd expect at a true bistro including escargots, steak frites and coq au vin. And then there are the prices (no entrees over $20). With a third location in Needham, suburbanites also get their French fill.

BREAKFAST
Mike & Patty's

A lot of good has come out of Formaggio Kitchen (see Wine and Cheese Shop), not the least of which includes this short-order duo. Word about their griddle skills and service with a smile spread faster than they could fry eggs for their "fancy" (dressed with cheddar, bacon, avocado, red onion and proprietary house mayo on toasted multigrain) breakfast sandwiches. The instant success couldn't have happened to a nicer pair of cooks.

Bakery: Bagels
Rosenfeld's Bagels

Boston knows a thing or two about round, breakfast treats, but in most cases it has nothing to do with bagels. The exception to the rule is hidden away in a subterranean storefront in Newton Centre—a place that not only gets them right, but also offers one-stop shopping for all your Shabbat and brunching needs: stacks of rich challahs (with or without seeds and raisins), tubs of whipped cream cheeses and schools of smoked fish.

BRUNCH
Henrietta's Table

So $20-plus might sound a bit steep, but this is no ordinary brunch. The raw bar with oysters and shrimp and the cheese table with pâtés and terrines are enough reason to hit Henrietta's Table on Saturdays ($28, three-course) and Sundays ($45, all-you-can-eat). The restaurant excels at taking local ingredients and paying homage to New England with dishes like the red-flannel hash and poached eggs with hollandaise sauce (on the à la carte menu). Those who can't get enough can pick up a copy of chef Peter Davis' debut cookbook as they pay the check.

BURGERS
Miracle of Science

For an unconventional take on a pub-style burger, try the version at this geeky-hip MIT hangout. The elements: a grill-striped, well-peppered beef patty, blanketed with your choice of cheddar, blue or pepper-jack cheese; creamy red bliss home fries; and sweet tomato chutney. (Purists, hold your gripes—bottles of Heinz, Grey Poupon and Tabasco are within reach).

BURRITO
Anna's Taqueria

Anna's has mastered the art of the burrito. Their perfect meat-to-cheese-to-topping ratio ensures each bite is as good as the next. Favorite stuffings include the grilled chicken and veggies. Really hungry? Get the super version. It costs less than five bucks, which leaves more money for sides like salsa and guacamole.

CHINESE
Bernard's

For Chinese food that skips the usual drenching in grease, Bernard's remains our go-to spot. Their tasty menu—which features all the staples plus a smattering of dim sum—brings Chinatown quality to the suburbs in a setting that's far from tacky. Some of our favorite plates include steamed wontons in hot-pepper-and-peanut sauce and cold sesame noodles. But you can't go wrong with any of their well-done classics from sesame chicken to crispy Peking duck.

DELI Zaftigs

You can consume only so much banana-stuffed French toast. Why not expand your horizons and try one of the other 248-plus menu items at this bustling, colorful deli? What are we kvelling over these days? Crisp latkes with smoked salmon, a fried-egg BLT on challah, good ol' chopped liver and a cup of tangy-sweet beet borscht (chilled, please) enriched with a dollop of sour cream. But prepare yourself for a potentially long wait.

DIM SUM
Chau Chow City

No matter how many other two-bite treats roll by in the hectic merry-go-round of pushcarts—Manila clams with black beans, pan-fried pork-and-chive buns, or silken tofu doused with sweet ginger syrup—it's the crêpe-like steamed rice noodle roll that always merits a second nod. Also noteworthy: The tri-story restaurant owns the adjacent Chau Chow Noodle Factory, producing their own starchy staple.

Cheap Eats | Orinoco

It's as if Andres Branger and Carlos Rodriguez saw the Wall Street storm approaching long before the skies opened up. Their recession-proof formula—high-quality, from-scratch Nuevo-Latino food like toasty arepas, overnight-cooked black beans, hearty salads and grilled marinated chicken all under the $20 mark—was already well-established when every other restaurant in town started trimming unnecessary fat. In fact, their original South End taguarita still draws such crowds that a line is forming at their Brookline branch.

DINER
Deluxe Town Diner

Originally, the addition of a take-out counter adjoining the diner's main car was met with considerable local criticism—fear of further congesting an already clogged corner of East Watertown. But now, most patrons are grateful for the nook. Anyone who's lined up for sour-cream flapjacks and breakfast sandwiches (don't doubt the veggie sausage; it's shockingly tasty) knows that no matter how fast they turn the tables, the wait is much-improved with a place to huddle and a cup of coffee.

DINING EMPIRE
Ken Oringer

Spanish tapas joint? Check. Gutsy, Asian-tinged French dining room (see French)? Check. Stylish steakhouse, posh sashimi bar, and authentic taqueria? Check, check, check. And as of this August, Ken Oringer can mark another accomplishment off his list with the debut of Coppa (replacing Dish in the South End), a pint-sized enoteca (i.e. Italian wine bar) he's opening with Toro executive chef Jamie Bissonnette. Given the partnership, we expect lots of snout-to-squiggly-tail snacks and, if we're lucky, some uni.

FRENCH
Clio

Just to clarify, this isn't the type of French restaurant that serves steak frites and tarte tatin. With all due respect to Parisian bistro fare, Ken Oringer's brainchild gets this award by way of masterful technique. Chef de cuisine Andrés Julian Grundy creates inventive French food, dressed up in culinary exotica: slow-roasted Kobe rib-eye with black fig chutney, duck two ways with Peking confitures and, when in season, white truffle tastings.

GREEK Aegean

For a real Greek town, you'll have to head to that other windy city. Here in Boston, we have one winner. At Aegean, you can order saganaki, spinach pie and souvlaki in a more refined setting than at many downtown gyro shops. The braised lamb is especially worth the trip to Framingham or Watertown. It's the next best thing to having Greek friends who put a spit in the yard come Easter.

Grampy's/Villa Mexico Cafe

Winona Ryder's graduation gift in Reality Bites—a paid gas-station credit card—would go a long way at Grampy's. Just across from the Triscuits boxes in the Beacon Hill mini-mart, owner Julie King toasts corn tortillas on her tiny griddle before filling them with slow-cooked meat, cheese, salsa and fresh guacamole. And then

Coffee Shop
South End Buttery

All most people want in the morning is a hot cuppa Joe and something carb-y to nibble on, but Bostonians—South Enders especially—are nothing if not particular about their first nourishment of the day. That accounts for the crowds outside this upmarket corner cafe, where Lipton, Folgers and Swiss Miss take a backseat to hauter brews, including leaves from Somerville-based Mem Tea Imports, Equator Estate beans (light or French roast) and Lake Champlain hot cocoa. Sports writer Peter King is just one of many fans.

ITALIAN | Erbaluce

Charles Draghi's new spot in Bay Village hasn't been open a year, and he's already proven (once again) why his earthy take on Italian is an old favorite (and will be a new favorite for those of you who missed Marcuccio's during its run). At Erbaluce, Draghi's oft-changing menu consists of a series of signature plates—like rack of wild boar and potato gnocchi—that play to his love of local ingredients. The restaurant also boasts a beautiful bar with its own bites.

ICE CREAM

Christina's

If you didn't know any better, you might think Ray Ford strolls the aisles of an Asian market when looking for flavor inspiration. Fresh rose petal, adzuki bean, lemongrass, chocolate Chinese five spice, lychee and coconut are among his current list of 127 premium (14 percent butterfat) ice creams and sorbets. INDIAN

Tamarind Bay

Unlike the plethora of local dhabas and curry houses, Tamarind Bay's new Washington Square outpost revels in robust, lesser-known flavors from India's 4,600-plus miles of coastline. Plump goan mirchi shrimp swim in a creamy, coconut-chile sauce, which, along with black lentils, makes an ideal bath for blistered garlic naan. Meanwhile, red cabbage chitwas and cheese-potato fritters pack a latke-like crunch that will have you swooning over humble vegetables.

JAPANESE

O Ya

The hardest part about dining at this Leather District gem is eating anywhere else afterward. Tim and Nancy Cushman have impressed food critics and locals alike with their elegant cuisine executed with stunning precision. Some of their ingredients are flown in from Japan, and each dish densely packs layers of flavors, which justifies the small portions and special-occasion prices. Though O Ya's one of the most-touted restaurants in the nation right now, their low-key, airy space encourages an unpretentious dining experience.

KOREAN

Buk Kyung

Most Korean joints around town are all about the BBQ, but this washed-out Somerville storefront—the first (and foremost) of their two locations—shows distinct Chinese influence. A bowlful of their springy house-made noodles and pork thickly dressed in black-bean paste (jajangmyun) is a comfort food equivalent of mac 'n' cheese. Meanwhile, the cauldron of kopdol bibimbap resembles a composed salad of sorts: beef shreds and a still-cooking egg are just waiting to be tossed together with the crackly rice layer.

Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. stellaartois.com

B&G Oysters

A lobster roll may only contain a few ingredients, but it's easy to mess up. Fortunately, B&G Oysters has the formula down, with large chunks of the good stuff tossed in a light mayo and piled onto a buttered hot dog bun. A sprinkling of parsley adds a pop of color and even more flavor, while the generous portion of fries and salty pickles completes the plate. It's even better paired with one of the lovely white wine options.

MARGARITA
Masa

At Masa, the margarita gets the royal treatment and sour mix is a no-no. Their rendition of the classic, renamed the Masarita, adds a splash of apple juice (a mega-version for $34 serves 4–6 people). Other options include a spicy watermelon-habanero combo with fruit puree and a sangria margarita with Sauza tequila, peach schnapps, malbec wine and fresh-squeezed orange juice. They say the customer is always right, a cliché that Drink takes to a whole new level. At Barbara Lynch's buzzed-about bar, there's no cocktail list because what you sip is made specifically to your liking, following a brief conversation with one of the talented mixologists (helmed by John Gertsen). MEDITERRANEAN
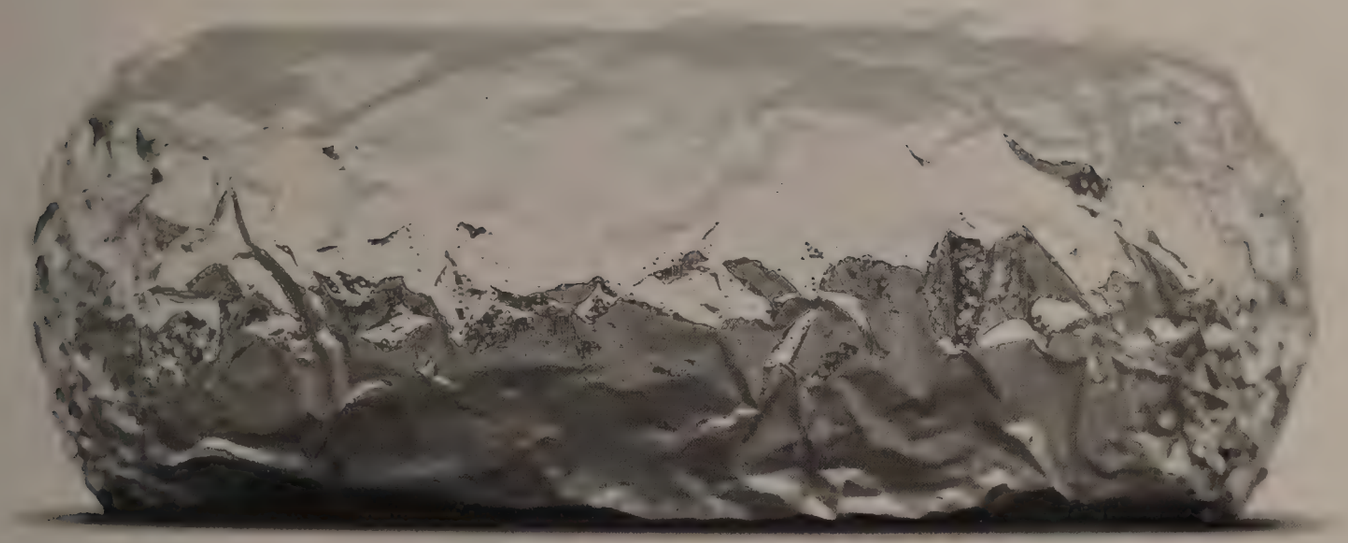
Oleana



We held our collective breath when Ana Sortun opened Sofra. Excited as we were for the more casual kid sister, we worried that the original's groundbreaking fare (basturma-wrapped hummus and Turkish cheese pancakes) might falter. We'd just like to take this opportunity to say chef de cuisine Cassie Kyriakides Piuma (see Rising Star) officially put those fears to rest. A standout on the menu is the shrimp cocktail, which Kyriakides Piuma inventively pairs with a

The fair-trade chai foams are fantastic, too. It's a veritable picnic basket of lunch and snack options that caters to everyone from the tree-hugging hipster grabbing some urban honey to the business dude who just wants a sub and a soda.

Angela was born in the state of Puebla, and her many moles reflect that region. Two words: cheese borek. This savory, lasagna-like square that layers stretchy, salty-sweet cheese between sheets of papery, phyllo-type dough is, quite possibly, our new favorite food. Not to mention all of Ana Sortun and Maura Kilpatrick's other pastries, flatbreads, spreads, beverages and Turkish treats. You're late. You blew all your cash on orchestra seats to Jersey Boys—but you'll never make it through Act 2 without some pre-curtain chow. Fortunately, Beach Street's Chinatown gate sits just a few blocks from the Theater District—and the food is quick, fresh and absurdly cheap. STEAK TIPS
Silvertone Bar & Grill

So there's a lot to love about Silvertone (see page 70), including the great bartenders and laid-back vibe. But it's the steak tips that really make us happy. Smothered in a sweet-and-tangy Long Island marinade, and served over a generous portion of mashed potatoes and greens, the tips taste tender and juicy—and don't resemble beef jerky at all. SUBURBAN
Il Casale

Second acts rarely rival the original production, but for Dante de Magistris, introducing his namesake restaurant's sibling was as easy as coming home to cook. He and his brothers grew up in Belmont, near the converted firehouse where they're now sharing old family recipes. Some of the best include their grandmother's super-soft gnocchi, understated aglio e olio (a de Magistris Christmas tradition) and must-have ricotta frittelle with melted chocolate.

ROMANTIC | Dalí

You know a restaurant's romantic when locals routinely get engaged there. Dalí's general manager Cesar Salgado estimates that last year alone, 15–20 couples popped the question in this candle-lit but jovially noisy tapas place. Intimate, dark and elaborately decorated, the Spanish spot is a longtime favorite among lovey-dovey diners. There's something erotic about squid in its own ink. Well, maybe not, but Dalí is still a great date choice.

Tough call: the young Sardinian Pecorino Cafone, the firm cow's milk Tomme du Berger from the Franche-Compte region, or the creamy Connecticut cow's milk Hooligan? When in doubt, try them all—or, for a more budget-minded approach, paw through the store's selection of cheese ends, perfect for sampling on a shoestring. Also check out the meat case, where you might snag some prosciutto scraps or a pepperoni medley.

SUSHI Douzo

Sure, you can get the usual suspects at Douzo, like California and Philadelphia. But it's the special rolls that really set this sushi spot apart. Boston's own Back Bay—asparagus, cucumber, tuna, avocado and wasabi sauce—is a fave, while newer options feature coconut and eel or mango and sweet shrimp. Of course, the setting doesn't hurt either. Douzo isn't some hole-in-the-wall; the mod lounge feels more like a destination than a restaurant.

TAPAS
Toro

One look at the latest menu, and it's obvious that Ken Oringer's got a meat guy running the kitchen (don't worry—the corn is still there). Duck ham, bone marrow and head cheese all made the cut. If you fancy charcuterie, pray that executive chef/offal-hound Jamie Bissonnette includes a slab of whatever he does with calves' brains. As for a midday meal, divide your calories between the chorizo sloppy joe and the beefy hamburger con queso.

THAI
Montien

Ordering pad thai at this original Theater District location (skip the Inman Square outpost) is like choosing grilled cheese instead of a pastrami sandwich at a great Jewish deli—in short, a wasted opportunity. Ditch the gringo menu and ask for the Thai version, a lengthy roster of spicy soups, meaty frogs' legs, plump mussel pancakes with chile sauce, bracing som tum (spicy papaya salad) and fried Thai sausages.

UNDERRATED
Beacon Hill Bistro

There's a young Wyoming rancher at the helm of this clean-lined hotel dining room, but everything about his cooking suggests Parisian training. Like several of his local contemporaries, Jason Bond's pièce de résistance is his charcuterie plate—a rotation of house-made pâtés and everything pig-related with the traditional fixings. But we're particularly smitten with his tangle of tagliatelle and Woodbury clams, his fresh fish and his general dedication to all things local. BHB is about more than brunch.

USE OF LOCAL INGREDIENTS
T.W. Food

T.W. Food could win so many awards, but we choose to highlight Tim Wiechmann's lovely way with regional ingredients. Replete with words like "farm," "grass-fed" and "local," his menu plays to New England's strengths. You ain't eaten an egg 'til you eat his, scrambled with porcini mushrooms and red scallion. Despite his talents, Wiechmann is low-key, letting his wife, Bronwyn, run the show.

VIETNAMESE
Pho 2000

This is no ordinary prix-fixe: For $15 each, two people can feast on seven preparations of beef—paper-thin slabs simmered in broth, fried in butter, citrus-marinated, skewered, leaf-wrapped, ground with peanuts and lemongrass, and cooked in soup with rice. It's even cheaper for three, and a downright steal to divide it among four; and that justifies ordering a lacy crepe, a pot of salt-licked caramelized spareribs, or a small (though actually quite large) bowl of steamy pho.

WINE BAR
The Butcher Shop

Many restaurants are following Barbara Lynch's lead by trimming their menus down to oversized appetizers and a thoughtfully chosen wine list. But Lynch's not-so-rustic enoteca still outranks them all. Under sommelier Cat Silirie's direction, the highly pedigreed vintages—choose from about 100 different bottles—are perfectly matched with the likes of tasty pâtés, house-cured salumi, quivering terrines and the renowned No. 9 Bolognese.

WINGS
Buff's Pub

Even Buffalo natives admit that this dive-y (cash-only) Newton Corner watering hole wings it almost as well as their precious Anchor Bar. Along with a pint of whatever's on draft and a few rowdy sports nuts, these crisp, meaty wings doused in a sauce of your choice (honey hot, please) make for an ideal evening in front of their really big flatscreen TVs.

NEIGHBORHOODS

BACK BAY
Mistral

Walk by any night of the week, and you'll see the beautiful people getting out of their exotic cars. Unlike some of the flashier clientele, Jamie Mammano's legendary French restaurant is a study in subdued elegance. Besides all the pricey (and worth-every-penny) entrees like roasted duck-and-wild mushroom risotto with dried Wisconsin cherry gastrique, a new small-plate menu at the bar means that even casual diners can have their foie gras crostini. Even better? Sundays and Mondays through the summer offer a prix-fixe menu for $35, a steal by Mistral standards.

BEACON HILL
No. 9 Park

Barbara Lynch's flagship location—still, according to many gourmands, her magnum opus—may be a Beacon Hill mainstay, but their lofty prix-fixe meals disqualify them from being a true "neighborhood" spot. Particularly after Lynch quietly discontinued the "cafe" (aka more affordable) fare. She must have heard the hungry outcries because à la carte options and a bar menu have returned. Not exactly recession dining, but a limited-access pass to her handsome townhouse and exquisite cuisine, nonetheless.

Charlestown | Olives

Todd English's baby is all grown up. This year he celebrated his Charlestown restaurant's 20th birthday, recalling those nascent days with throwback menu items—and prices—like brick-oven-roasted chicken with mashed potatoes, beef carpaccio with Roquefort polenta and bouillabaisse. Despite all his other successes—you can't help but notice him on TV, aboard the QE2 and even in Terminal B at Logan—his original fanbase is still eating very well on his home turf.

BROOKLINE

Lineage

Filling up on the bread has always been a no-no, but in Jeremy and Lisa Sewall's dining room it's entirely justified. Don't misunderstand; the seafood-heavy menu (Jeremy started at the recently shuttered Great Bay) is always solid and often locally sourced, and foodies have heard the butterscotch pudding chatter. But the warm, salted brioche rolls—made daily by the Sewalls and their staff—will carb your enthusiasm.

CAMBRIDGE

Rialto

Maybe it's her dedication to hunger relief, her stacked culinary résumé, or those red tango shoes she breaks out every now and then—whatever keeps Jody Adams on her toes, it's also kept her kitchen in good stead for the past 15 years. At the bar, diehard fans still savor iconic, tastemaker dishes like littlenecks with andouille and rouille-thickened fisherman's soup, while her dining-room plates are as fresh and flavorful as the seasonal ingredients they showcase.

DORCHESTER

Ashmont Grill

As Chris Douglass prepared the final batches of wild mushroom polenta and pan-fried soft shells at recently closed Icarus, his alter-ego neighborhood grill was as bustling as ever. The high-ceilinged, broad-windowed dining room in Peabody Square lets in almost as much light as the canopied back garden, where smoke from the wood-burning "fireplace"—essentially, an open drum that burns logs—whets your appetite for grilled shrimp tacos, mustard-sauced pulled pork and always tasty blackboard specials.

FINANCIAL DISTRICT

Radius

Though often overshadowed by the dripping horseradish cream and frizzled onions crowning one of Boston's—actually, the country's—most championed burgers, the menu features plenty of other stunning food feats. As expected at this high-rolling, business-suited rotunda, decadence is standard. Both raw and slow-cooked delicacies—ahi tuna and steak tartare, and gently roasted rib eye—headline chef Michael Schlow's list of modernized, Asian-influenced French fare. Those, plus lots of truffles, bacon, foie gras (preparations change nightly) and butter, butter everywhere.

JAMAICA PLAIN

Ten Tables

Krista Kranyak couldn't continue with just 10 tables. The answering machine at her Centre Street spot would get so clogged with reservation requests that diners couldn't leave a message, let alone snag a forkful of her stellar charcuterie, sausages and hand-rolled pastas. The solution? Seventeen more tables in Craigie's old digs (and an account with OpenTable). That said, the original is still our favorite JP restaurant; quality-wise, Kranyak serves the best deal in town. Two towns, actually.

Bricco

You haven't tasted pasta until you've had the fresh, airy sheets at Bricco. Generous portions of house-made pappardelle twirl around chunks of wild boar and porcini mushrooms, drenched in a red-wine sauce sweetened through reduction, while other fillings might include sausage and radicchio, or pumpkin and truffles. North Enders know to swing by this upscale-yet-welcoming eatery late-night Tuesday through Saturday for a slice of pizza from the wood oven, which churns out pies until 2 am.

SOMERVILLE

Highland Kitchen

Artichoke season never comes fast enough in Mark Romano's kitchen. No sooner do the pale green thistles hit the market—Romano opts for the baby bulbs—than he lightly chars them over the grill and pairs the leaves with cool tartar sauce and lemon. It's just one example of what makes this place a regular spot for Somerville residents. Also adding to the gastropub's draw: smoked bluefish cakes, Carolina-style pulled pork, old-school bar snacks like deviled eggs and house pickles, and a mean cocktail program.

SOUTH BOSTON

Sportello

All the hype about No. 9's prune-stuffed gnocchi, B&G's glistening oysters and the Butcher Shop's rillettes is well-deserved, but Barbara Lynch is an Italian girl from Southie, and with Sportello she's back to her roots. That's the plan from the moment you snag a barstool and swipe a piece of scali bread—just like the stuff her mom kept around the house—in cushiony ricotta. To experience her culinary expertise, order a bowlful of bigoli, strozzapretti, gnocchi or Bolognese-sauced pappardelle. The tomato soup makes a perfect winter lunch.

SOUTH END

Stella

Chef/owner Evan Deluty got it right the first time—semi-haute pastas, crackery pizzas and other Italian-style dishes served to a well-dressed, up-late crowd—so we weren't surprised when he did as many of his fellow restaurateurs have done and opened a smaller, sister eatery. Stella Express goes more casual, with a bakery case (sweet tooths, note the red velvet cupcakes), a create-your-own-salad bar and sandwiches. Of course, you could just go next door, grab a table and order the tagliatelle like you always do. Chef Robin King is as consistent as they come.

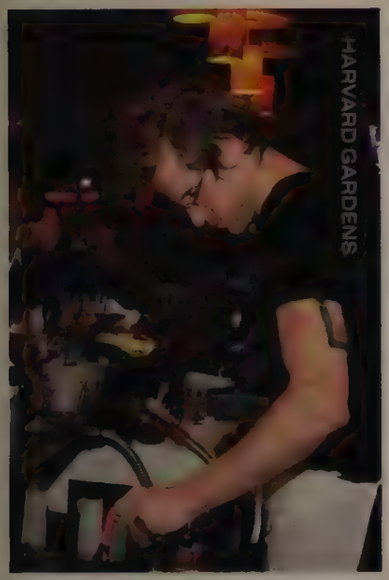
Bars & Clubs



Tuesday
Heartthrob at Middlesex Lounge

Every other Tuesday, the hipsters descend. A brotherhood of brainy cyclist-types don wacky outfits (or is that what they always wear?) and pulsate at this techno/electronica dance night. Black lights and a baby-faced crowd take over the industrial-chic bar (like sister venues Audubon Circle and Miracle of Science next door), when the benches are pushed aside to open the floor.

20-SOMETHING SINGLES
Harvard Gardens

Neither near Harvard nor a garden, Harvard Gardens is a restaurant firmly anchored to the back of Beacon Hill. At the bar, a flourishing singles scene attracts an under-30 crowd that appreciates the casual decor, well-priced drink menu and chance to rub elbows (and perhaps more) with the highest concentration of doctors and nurses in town. Employees at MGH across the street come for the company, not for the health benefits of the Mexican chorizo empanadas and chicken wings stuffed with sausage and blue cheese.

30-SOMETHING SINGLES
The Beehive

From her post behind the bar, IO Steel can spot the couples at a glance. "First dates, blind dates, Internet dates... they seem awkward," Steel observes. But, she adds, they loosen up quickly as they warm to the Beehive's low-key vibe and sip cocktails like the Cougar. "A lot of the younger girls think it's funny, and older women order it, too," Steel says of the rosy-hued, neo-Cosmo made from vodka, Lichido Liqueur, orange bitters and Champagne.

Another icebreaker—aside from the deer head mounted on the wall—are the Beehive frites. Heck, we'd make a date with those any time.

Toward the middle and end of the week, the bar at Abe & Louie's gets "crazy-packed," says one regular. But that's not a bad thing. "You're thrown against people, and there's no place to hide, so you start talking to them." What kind of people? Businesspeople in their 40s mostly, including those who do work and those who've clearly had work done. Although the singles scene is what lures the crowd, what keeps them there are the high-quality drinks—"not fancy, foofy cocktails."

At this temple to drinking, beer is both revered and treated as a plaything. Who else but the guys at Sunset would blend ice cream with the rarefied flavors of the pricey Sam Adams Utopias? Who else would feature 112 beers on tap and 380 other microbrews, exotic imports, cask-conditioned ales, meads, ciders and barley wines? Just as countless area restaurants boast of "award-winning" clam chowders, Watch City, like any good brew pub, offers a slew of "award-winning" beers. The Chocolate Thunder Porter, for instance, contains hefty quantities of Taza chocolate from Somerville. PLACE TO TAKE YOUR FRIENDS FROM NEW YORK
Union Oyster House

Sit in JFK's favorite booth. Dine on his favorite lobster stew. Gawk at the oyster shucker's amazing manual dexterity. At the country's oldest continuously running restaurant, the history hangs in the air as thick as chowder. Factoid: Daniel Webster stopped in daily for brandy and multiple plates of oysters at the semi-circular bar. A block from Faneuil Hall, this National Historic Landmark is like the Boston cousin of Delmonico's in lower Manhattan, only nine years older.

POST-TD BANKNORTH GARDEN
The Greatest Bar

When you call yourself "the greatest," you'd better have more to boast about than the biggest HDTV in Boston. And the Greatest Bar does indeed have more, with a staggering amount of square footage divvied up among four levels, each bedecked with an equally remarkable amount of Boston-themed artwork. Photos

Jamaica Plain
Alchemist Lounge

Located just outside Hyde Square, in the building where the proto-dive Triple Ds once held sway, the Alchemist's lofty, tabernacular space now draws hipsters and young professionals, even toddlers—accompanied by an adult, of course. With classic cocktails, an inspired beer list, live music, Jeopardy trivia and an open-mike night, this JP spot has all the bases covered at their bar, dining room and patio.

PRE-FENWAY
The Bleacher Bar

Under the bleachers at Fenway Park, in a space once used to store the visiting team's batting cage, is a brilliant idea in the form of a watering hole: a place where, even without a ticket, you can drink beer and watch the pros shag flies. The Bleacher Bar provides a view through the center-field wall right into the park. Of course, there's a catch: Things get busy before the opening pitch, and no reservations are taken on game days. That's just the way the ball bounces.

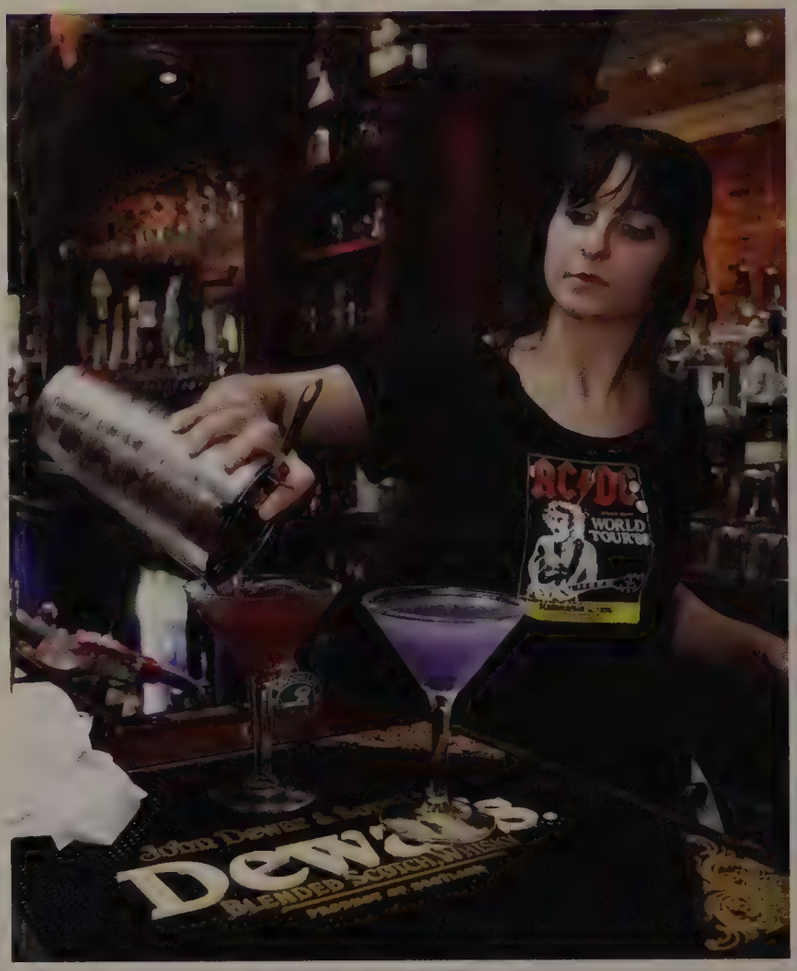
PRE-TD BANKNORTH GARDEN
The Four's



Open since 1976, the Four's claims to be one of the first sports pubs in the country. More important, they win best in show for a pre-game visit, given their unbeatably convenient location, 42 TVs and huge collection of sports memorabilia. Menu suggestion: Try the sandwiches named for local sport celebrities, like the house special Bobby Orr: steak tips and melted cheese on a fresh roll.

PRO-ATHLETE PLAYGROUND
Daisy Buchanan's

A casual, crowded singles spot, Daisy Buchanan's Newbury Street location draws a hefty helping of professional football, baseball and basketball players, as well as the groupies who love them. Plus, drinks and food are tasty and reasonably priced. Tagging along for the ride are local jocks, neighborhood regulars and anyone else seeking an alternate definition for the term "pickup game."

With their black-and-white tile floor and mahogany bar topped with a mean set of longhorns, New Orleans meets East Texas at Boston's Deep Ellum. Think Bukowski Tavern, but with less angst. A long, narrow space invoking the moniker of the Arts District on Deep Elm Street in Dallas (hometown of co-owner Aaron Sanders), Deep Ellum boasts classic cocktails, a smart beer selection, inventive food and a CD playlist that attracts cool customers of all ages. Plus, there's a great deck.

SPORTS BAR
The Sports Depot

Go ahead and grab any seat, because there's not a bad one in the house, given the plethora of big screens—more than 50—at this Allston landmark. And the Sports Depot's menu is a statistical wonder, too, with 17 starters, 18 sandwiches, and a stacked lineup of pasta, chicken, steak, seafood, barbecue and Mexican dishes. If the game runs late, or you're a fan of a West Coast team, you can still get a pizza at the bar, as the kitchen stays open until 12:30 am.

SUMMER SINGLES SCENE

The waterfront view is certainly terrific, but that's not what draws singles to Tia's, open April through October. Nor are specials like pulled pork sliders or peel 'n' eat shrimp the sole reason to flock to the patio on sunny afternoons. Every year, Tia's makes good on their reputation as the best summer pickup scene in Boston. It's hot and crowded in all the right ways.

BACK BAY

Bukowski Tavern

With dead authors for the eyes, Dead Kennedys for the ears, Berklee kids for neighbors, and classy brews and wines for the palate, Bukowski Tavern is a magnet for the beats. While hip-lit namesake Charles Bukowski never actually lived here, more than 100 of his letters are housed at BU's Mugar Library. So who's to say he wouldn't have liked hanging out at this cash-only bar? He may be looking down on the crowd right now from punk/funk heaven.

BEACON HILL

The Sevens Ale House

This Hill fixture was already famous back in the happy days of the late '60s when Emerson College alums like Henry Winkler (aka the Fonz) and businessman Peter Meade, now a pillar of the city, are rumored to have hung there. Dim, but with a polished decor and the requisite faux-Tiffany lamps, this old house is an old-school pub, serving beer and wine only, and little's changed in more than 70 years. Proprietor Jack Kiley creates a real Cheers ambience with his champion darts team, bottles of High Life and support for community charities.

BROOKLINE

Matt Murphy's Pub

Only five seats at the bar and good food? How can this be an authentic Irish pub? Believe it. Most nights it's standing room only at this Brookline hot spot, which teems with (mainly young) regulars who live nearby and cherish the spirits collection. Sister to Pomodoro, a gourmet bistro a short dropkick down the street, Murphy's is one Irish pub that dares to emphasize their... cuisine. With live music on hold at the moment, trivia and comedy provide a night's entertainment. All in all, the perfect place for a third date.

Green Street

This storied gastropub with a list of 100 specialty cocktails is a favorite haunt for the town's elite imbibers, many of them in the trade. Holding Cambridge's oldest continuous liquor license (from 1933), Green Street draws a smart, no-frills set. You can talk philosophy at the bar, but don't broadcast it. NORTH END

Waterfront Café Bar and Grill

Owner Rocco Zagarella brings a welcome oddity to the North End: an Italian sports pub. The Waterfront features a barkeep who phones home to Italy on Mother's Day backed by a kitchen well-versed in homestyle haddock. Locals in silk suits and cargo shorts have been popping in after work since the turn of this short century. With amazingly long lists of beers and drinks and a clique of devoted fans, the Indo is the spiritual successor to the venerable B-side, now shuttered. Manners, Passion Pit

The wait is over. Two years after "Sleepyhead" awoke Boston to Passion Pit, the quirky quintet released its first full-length album, Manners. Fronted by falsetto-inclined singer Michael Angelakos, the band delivers uplifting, even sugary music—replete with horns and (hello, Pink Floyd) a children's choir. ROCK BAND | Bishop Allen

The musical group that evolved into Bishop Allen first formed at Harvard, where the singer/guitarists Justin Rice and Christian Rudder were roommates, college DJs and leaders of a punk band, the Pissed Officers. After graduation, they left town, switched musical gears to a breezy alt-folk style and named themselves after a road in Cambridge. Good move. Last year, Rice and Rudder—along with bandmates Darbie Nowatka, Keith Poulson and Michael Tapper—played themselves in Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist, planting them firmly in the category of "arrived." Their fourth CD, Grrr ..., came out in March.

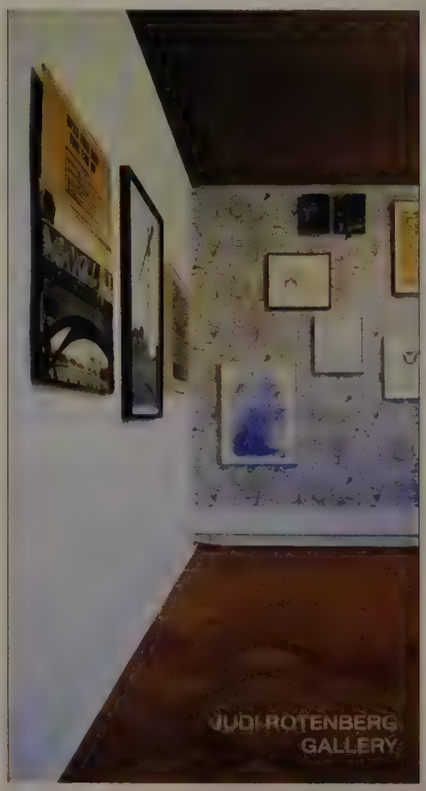
EXHIBIT

Tara Donovan at the Institute of Contemporary Art



Last year, Bostonians took their first look at a particularly confusing mass of paper plates, straws, Styrofoam cups and Scotch tape. And they liked it. The New York–based Donovan says, "When I begin working, I don't necessarily have a strict idea of the form it will take or how it will relate to space. As my process continues and the experimentation takes on a larger scale, I begin to catch glimpses of possible outcomes that I can then exploit." The effect is dreamy and surreal. And very cool.

PRODUCTION

Boston Ballet's Black & White

Boston Ballet is usually celebrated for its classical work, less frequently for oozing sexuality. Last February, choreographer Jirí Kylián took a leap and gave audiences five short, provocative numbers in Black & White. The work was enlivened by the spectacle of 18th-century-style ball gowns whisking across the stage on casters, hovering overhead, or sometimes draping the dancers like veils. Decidedly not Swan Lake.

Hasty Pudding Theatricals

Nothing says February in Cambridge like the annual show from the country's oldest student-run theatrical troupe. This year it was Acropolis Now!, a comedy-musical, that, as usual, took a movie title, turned it on its head, and packed the script with puns and men in drag. "Quirky but professional" is how former HPT president Evan Eachus puts it. "At the core we are college kids having fun, but we take our roles very seriously." It's all about big costumes, big numbers and, of course, the Hasty Pudding Woman of the Year award, carried off this time around by a proud Renée Zellweger.

When the temporarily reunited J. Geils Band played opening night at this glittering, new venue, we knew the good times had come back to Lansdowne Street (Dan Aykroyd's Blues Brothers Revue headlined next). With a huge stage, superb sound and sightlines, and the most eclectic lineup in the city, nothing holds an upraised lighter (OK, iPhone) to the music mecca.

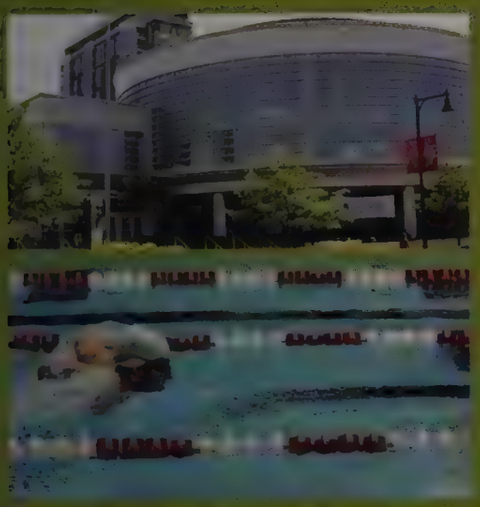
COMEBACK | The Bruins

After crushing Montreal 4-0 in the first round of the playoffs, the Bruins fell behind the Carolina Hurricanes 3-1 in the second. They won the next two to force a deciding Game 7—which they lost. But the Bruins' comeback is about more than a game or a series. This year marked the B's return to the city's sports consciousness. Sure, all they had to do was tie for the most wins in the NHL and sweep their most-hated rival in the playoffs, but the Bruins stole headlines at a time when most of Boston was obsessing over the Celtics, the Red Sox and what Tom Brady had for breakfast. They didn't win the Stanley Cup, but they won something else they'd been seeking for the past few years—respect.

BACKUP
Matt Cassell

The Patriots' 2008 season seemed to end just when it was beginning. Tom Brady went down, and all the shattered records of 2007 were forgotten. With Bernard Pollard's hit, the Pats veered in a scary new direction, as untested backup Matt Cassell strapped on his helmet and attempted to fill the shoes of the best QB in football. Nobody expected much—if anything. While not considered a liability, Cassell certainly wasn't a star. So it was a major surprise when, after Week 7, he was named AFC Offensive Player of the Week. Cassell garnered that accolade again at Week 12, when he threw for 415 yards and three TDs against the Dolphins. He became the fifth player in NFL history to have back-to-back 400-yard passing games and finished the season with 21 touchdown passes. On Nov. 30, against the Jets, he became the first player since the AFL-NFL merger to have at least 400 yards passing and 60 yards rushing in the same game. Cassell's unexpected success affirmed more than his talent. It affirmed our faith in the Patriots' system. If the worst happens, and Brady goes down again, we can have confidence that whoever is next on the depth chart will be ready to step up.



MATT CASSELL

BILL MUELLER UNPLEASANT SURPRISE AWARD
Manny Ramirez

This category was named for a player who suddenly went on a tear and defied expectations. We're not saying that Bill Mueller was on the juice, but these days any sudden career rejuvenation is immediately suspect. Manny Ramirez is just the latest example. It's not like Manny was on the skids, but his production after he went to the Dodgers was insane even by his own standards—who bats over .500 for the postseason? Sure, there's a certain glee that Manny's problems are no longer our problems, but it would be naive to assume that the continuing stream of unfortunate revelations won't eventually implicate a current Red Sox player. At this point, nobody is immune from suspicion. Except Dustin Pedroia.

CLUTCH PERFORMANCE
Glen Davis

Glen Davis averaged 18.1 points per game in the first round of the playoffs, but it wasn't until the second round that Big Baby came up huge. It's Game 4 against Orlando, the match is on the line, and Paul Pierce has the ball as the clock winds down. Pierce feels the double-team, kicks the ball out to Davis, and suddenly the C's fate is in the hands of the young second-year player. Davis calmly drains the shot and then reacts with explosive exuberance—even brushing a chubby, young fan aside, as if to show symbolically that Big Baby had grown up. If there was any upside to the Celtics' rash of injuries last season,

FEMALE ATHLETE | Kara Goucher

It seems like a foregone conclusion that a Kenyan will win the Boston Marathon, but this year Kara Goucher gave running fans a chance to root for an American who had a prayer of breaking the tape. Goucher ran her first professional marathon only last November, but entered the 2009 Boston event as a legitimate contender. In fact, she led the pack as late as mile 25, but finished in 2:32:25—a mere nine seconds from glory. Goucher vows that she and her ripped abs will be back, meaning that next April we'll once again have a reason to care about distance running.

it's that Davis got the chance to prove he belongs on the court with the elite players.

CRAFTY VETERAN
Paul Pierce

It's a signature Paul Pierce move: Crouched low, working a lazy crossover dribble, he explodes toward the hoop and pulls up near the foul line. Swish. Everyone knows what's coming, and yet it can't be stopped. It wasn't so long ago that Pierce was the Celtics' only weapon, so we never really knew how unselfish he could be when not tasked with carrying the team on his back every night. In a league where the egos are as big as the contracts, Pierce now seems content as a cog in the Celtics machine, stepping up to lead when called on but getting his points where they come. If anything, Pierce is a greater threat now than in the past, because he's adapted to a system that has other options. On a team stacked with a few crafty vets, Pierce remains the craftiest.

GIFT THAT KEEPS ON GIVING
The Yankees

Just when it seems the Yankees can't get any more ridiculous, they top themselves. This season we've had headlines like A-Rod on 'roids, a new Yankee Stadium with screwy wind patterns and empty luxury seats, and, as we write this, one-time Hope for the Future Chien-Ming Wang with an E.R.A. above 14. In a few short years, the Yankees have transformed themselves from perennial front-runners and Vader-caliber adversaries to a motley band of overpaid, sullen drug abusers who play in a Taj Mahal of stupidity and wasted resources. The Yankees were a recurring comedic muse on Seinfeld, but they're actually funnier now.

HEAD TATTOO
Stephon Marbury

When it comes to permanent body art applied to the skull, nobody classes up a cranium like midseason Celtics pickup Stephon Marbury. Starbury's tat—the logo for his brand of sneakers—adorns the left side of his head like some kind of stigmata signalling true talent. The Garden may not have gained a new banner this year, but it was nonetheless a banner year for head tattoos.

MVP
Rajon Rondo

When the Celtics drafted Rajon Rondo after his sophomore year at Kentucky, he was something of a blank slate, an insanely gifted athlete whose hoop skills were rough around the edges. There were frustrations early on, as the holes in Rondo's game became evident. (How many times did he completely burn a defender, only to miss the layup?) But now, at the ripe old age of 23, Rondo has the poise and demeanor of a floor general. In the Celtics' two playoff series this year, he came close to averaging a triple-double. He honed his shooting to make defenders pay for ceding a jumper. With his 171 pounds, Rondo committed hard fouls when necessary. Kevin Garnett taught him how to glare. And he became one of the premier point guards in the league, a building block for the Celtics' future. As long as he doesn't suffer a careerending roller-skate injury, we can look forward to many years of watching Celtics opponents get thoroughly Rondoed.

MVS
The Comerica Squirrel

On June 2, a squirrel made multiple appearances on the field as the Red Sox played the Tigers at Comerica. The squirrel seemed to have a particular affinity for Dustin Pedroia, hanging out by second base until he was chased away by groundskeepers (the squirrel, that is). It eventually ran into the Red Sox dugout, where it asked for a ride to a peaceful place where no human beings would bother it, such as the Yankees' luxury seats. The Red Sox won, 5-1, giving them a perfect record in games that are interrupted by furry rats.

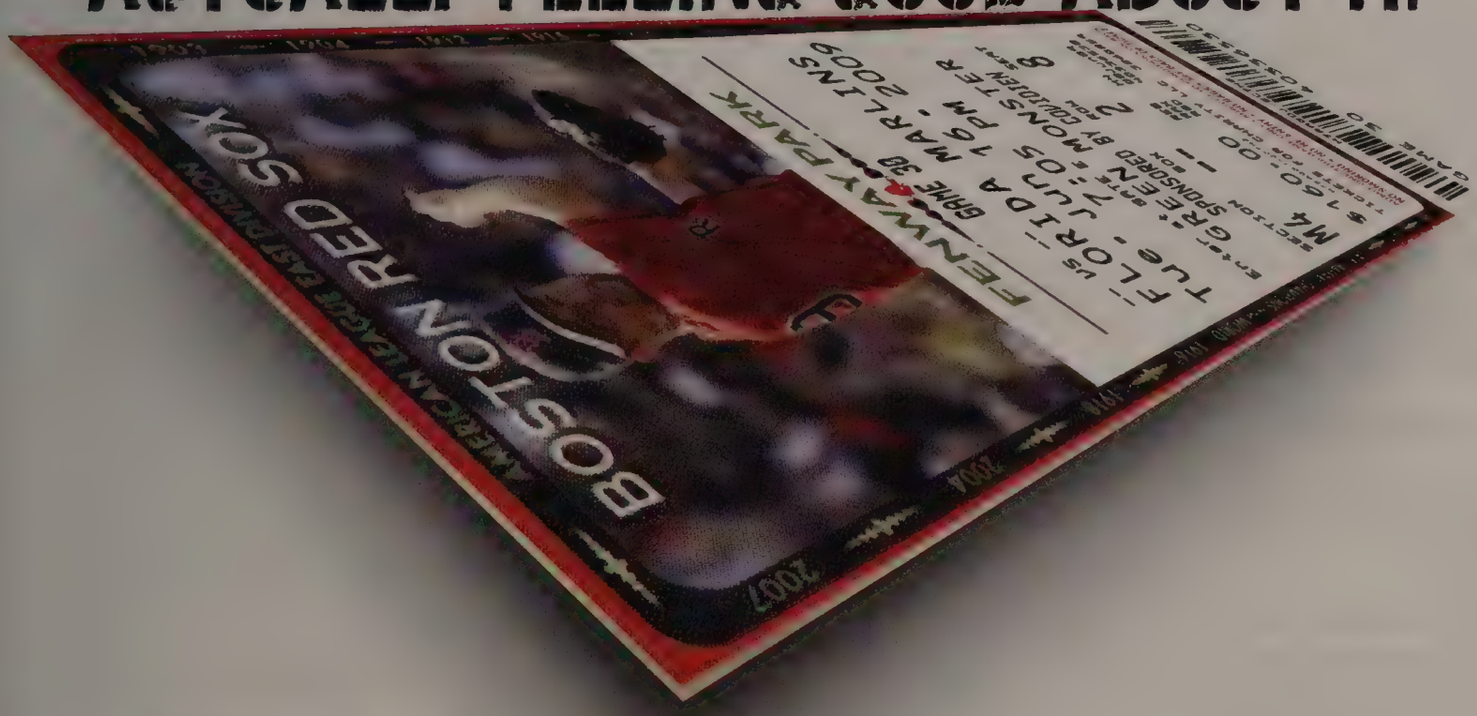
OUTRAGE
The Patriots Missing the Playoffs

The Patriots thrive on chalkboard material, trash talk and put-downs, but rarely does a slight come from the NFL itself. But that's exactly what happened in 2008, when the league's playoff structure resulted in the San Diego Chargers playing football in January while the Patriots played golf. The Chargers, you'll recall, owned a horrendous 4-8 record with three-quarters of the season behind them. They managed to claw their way back to .500. The Patriots, meanwhile, went 11-5 but missed the playoffs because the Jets lost their last game. Thus confirming something that the Jets learned the hard way: If the fate of your season ends up in the hands of Brett Favre, you have only yourself to blame.

SECRET WEAPON
Brian Scalabrine

When he takes the floor, it's like the Celtics decided to play with four basketball players plus some kind of leprechaun mascot. And that's how Brian Scalabrine surprises his opponents. He's like a koala bear—cuddly looking, but downright ornery at heart. The home crowd is complicit in downplaying Scalabrine's abilities, as there's an element of condescension toward our ginger giant. When Scal curls around to the corner and jacks up a three, he receives a sympathetic "Aah!" if he misses. And if he hits it, the crowd erupts with a cheer that's disproportionately enthusiastic, as though he were a special-needs kid who just made the play of his life. The next thing you know, Scal's headed back to the bench after producing the kind of stats guaranteed to keep the team in the game but his name under the radar. Just the way he likes it.

ROOKIE
Jerod Mayo



If the Patriots have had an obvious vulnerability in the past few years, it's their aging defense. With retirement looming for some crucial players (like Rodney Harrison), the Pats needed to find some fresh legs, and the process began with the 2008 draft. With the 10th pick, the Pats selected Tennessee linebacker Jerod Mayo, who started at inside linebacker from the first game of the season. It was quickly evident that the Pats made a solid pick, as Mayo was named NFL Rookie of the Month for October after leading the team with 24 tackles. Turns out he was just getting warmed up: Mayo later notched 23 tackles in a single game against the Jets, the largest single-game number for any Pats player in 15 years. He finished the season leading the team in tackles and took home the award for Associated Press Defensive Rookie of the Year. In the quest to slowly rebuild the Pats defense, Mayo is the new foundation.

TRADE
Ramirez for Bay

The Sox were widely castigated for the swap when it happened, but perhaps they knew—or suspected—something about our favorite spaced-out slugger they didn't reveal to the public. Last season, we got Jason Bay, an amiable Canadian, and the Dodgers got a guy who went on a historic tear straight through the playoffs. It looked like the Sox lost, since they had no choice but to get rid of Ramirez and take whatever they could get in return. But now, Bay is cruising as a valuable contributor (batting .276 with 18 home runs and 66 RBIs through 69 games), while Manny was served with a 50-game suspension for steroid use. Which raises the question: Drug-free, will he still be the guy with the Hall of Fame bat? Even if New Manny is 90 percent of his juiced-up self, this trade goes down as one of the most fortuitous in Sox history. We'll never again question the Theocracy.

CON ARTIST
Clark Rockefeller

Catch him if you can: Last July, Christian Karl Gerhartsreiter, aka Clark Rockefeller, kidnapped his daughter, Reigh, in front of the Four Seasons. While he implied they'd fled on a yacht, the pair were found in Baltimore—where ol' Clark was trying on a new alias, "Chip." Whatever you call him, Crockefeller was a hell of a con man until he blew his own cover. His wife, the ironically named Sandra Boss, was pulling down $40,000 per week but couldn't afford to sue him for divorce because he controlled all the couple's bank accounts. His sugar momma, rather than his imagined trust fund, probably helped him acquire the 300 one-ounce gold coins that the police discovered when they caught up with him. (Someone may have watched Pirates of the Caribbean a few too many times.) While this whole saga is rife with whoppers, our favorite Gerhartsreiter fib would have to be one he told his wife about a childhood accident that left him mute for almost 10 years. According to Rockesreiter's account, he was cured when he saw a dog and spoke the word "woofness." Germans have such a strange sense of humor.

Since they moved to mornings last December, Toucher & Rich have been even more cranky than they were before—these are two guys who sound like they hate early wake-ups as much as we do. DOUG MIRABELLI NOVEL USE OF A POLICE CRUISER

Aden and Jordan Jaric

Here in Massachusetts, there are varying standards to determine when to provide a police escort. Oct. 20, Aden and Jordan Jaric, a pair of gay strippers—and not just any gay strippers, but the "Brangelina" of the gay stripper community—got a police escort from Logan to the Roxy. Then, on Nov. 18, John Davis, who was taking his wife, Jennifer, to the hospital, asked a state trooper for help. Davis was driving in the breakdown lane because Jennifer was in labor, with contractions three minutes apart. So, police escort then? Not quite. Trooper Michael Galluccio made the couple wait while he wrote them a $100 ticket, thus preserving the sanctity of the breakdown lane. Lesson learned: If you're a pregnant woman and stopped for driving in the breakdown lane, don't say anything about being in labor. Say your name's Manuel Hung, and you're on the way to the Roxy. You'll be good to go.

DUBIOUS PAYCHECK

Jiansheng Li

Last February, The Boston Globe broke the story of Jiansheng Li, who was hired by Massport to help broker deals with Chinese companies. So far, Massport's paid Li more than $1.5 million, with a net result of one new contract (with shipping company Cosco). Since Li has no performance reviews and doesn't keep track of his hours, it's kind of hard to say whether he's earning his $18,000 per month, plus expenses. But we'd guess, no.

GUY WHOSE ADVICE WILL HEREBY BE TAKEN SERIOUSLY

Harry Markopolos

Not everyone bought into the Bernie Madoff magic. One

Boston financial analyst, Harry Markopolos, began investigating Madoff back in 2000 to figure out how he got his freakily consistent returns. Markopolos decided that nobody could realistically achieve constant across-the-board gains even in down markets (in retrospect, a shockingly obvious conclusion), so he tried to warn the Securities and Exchange Commission that they had a

ARTIST | Shepard Fairey

Shepard Fairey's Andre the Giant stickers have been around town for years. But Fairey's career shot into the stratosphere when his Obama "Hope" poster became a campaign icon. Last February, Fairey was on his way to his first solo exhibition at the ICA when the good vibes fizzed a bit. Boston police arrested him on two charges of graffiti—it was Andre the Giant coming back to haunt him. Thus Fairey missed the opening of his own show because he was cuffed and stuffed. Which is brilliant. Just when his work assumed the burden of ubiquity, Fairey went and reestablished his street cred by getting thrown in the clink. Well played, Mr. Fairey, well played.

SLOW RIDE | The Green Line Extension

The T wants to extend the Green Line beyond Lechmere, through Somerville and into Medford. Proponents say it will benefit neighborhoods. Detractors say, "I prefer living in my house to having it taken by eminent domain." We say everyone should settle down. Because it isn't happening overnight. You've got things like the North Terminal Area Study. One of its objectives was to "design a new transit alignment to permit a future branch extension (of the Green Line) to Somerville." And that was back in 1962.

massive fraud on their hands. In fact, that was pretty much the title of his 2005 SEC memo about Madoff: "The World's Largest Hedge Fund Is a Fraud." Unfortunately for all of Madoff's investors, the SEC didn't listen. Going forward, we're pretty sure that when Markopolos raises a red flag, the financial world will pay attention.

MOST MISSED

John Updike

John Updike wrote for The New Yorker, but he belonged to Boston. A Harvard grad, Updike moved to Ipswich in 1957 and began one of the most successful literary careers in American history. Updike was the rare writer who garnered both critical and popular acclaim, winning two Pulitzer Prizes and selling millions of books (more than four million copies of Couples alone). Time magazine put him on its cover twice and named Rabbit, Run one of the top 100 greatest novels. For his part, Updike didn't pull a Salinger, producing a big hit and then fading into obscurity. When he wrote The Witches of Eastwick, Updike was already beyond his 50th birthday and still going strong. The man worked right up to his death last January, his prose as sharp as ever. The country lost a great writer this year, but Updike achieved literary immortality a long time ago.

PLACE TO BREAK UP

Aboard a Harbor Cruise

There you are on the harbor cruise with your future ex. After dropping the news, it seems like you can't escape. That's where the pirates come in. With canny timing, a skiff with your friends (pirates) comes alongside the Spirit of Boston, and weapon-brandishing thugs demand a hostage. For the good of everyone, you make like Captain Richard Phillips and volunteer yourself. "I may never see you again," you call while climbing into the boat. Note: To execute this properly, be sure to inform the local snipers that your friends aren't really pirates.

PROFESSIONAL RESURRECTION

Larry Summers

Larry Summers resigned as president of Harvard back in 2006, after a controversial speech in which he insinuated (we're paraphrasing) that women don't do math so good. This left him in an unusual position: having "president of Harvard" on his résumé and the entire world knowing he flubbed it. Three years later, Summers is back in the public eye, arguably in a more important post than one devoted to playing babysitter to wicked smaht kids. Summers is now the director of the White House National Economic Council, which, even if you think he's hobbled by his loyalties to (and generous paychecks from) Wall Street, is certainly a return to the limelight. And while his ideas may not do much to rescue our economy, his speaking fees and hedge fund checks are sweet vindication.

UP-AND-COMING AIRPORT

Logan

Travelocity's "search nearby airports" function provides a menu of tempting alternatives for Boston travelers. TF Green, Manchvegas, Slappy's Airfield and 15-Minute Liposuction—it feels like the dinky regional airports always offer better deals than Logan. But that's changing. Southwest is onboard, Virgin America is here, and JetBlue seems to keep adding routes. Throw in a couple shiny new terminals, and frequent travelers may have noticed that Logan has quietly turned into one of the nicer airports in the country. That said, we're Bostonians and complaining about Logan is an ingrained habit that's hard to overcome. So it's our duty to point out that the lounges in Terminal E look like they were built by color-blind chimpanzees on meth.

WORST PLACE TO MAKE OUT

The Driver's Seat of a Green Line Train

It's hard enough to drive a train or bus while you're texting. But making out, too? That's taking multitasking a step too far. So if you see your T driver making out, or even ogling a comely coworker, don't delay: Get off at the next stop. Because the driver's seat is no place to forge a lusty liplock, especially if that driver's seat is connected to a very heavy piece of moving metal.

WORST PLACE TO RUN ON EMPTY

Nantucket

Over the past year, fuel prices have bounced around like a Super Crazy Ball launched from a trebuchet. Nowhere is the volatility more pronounced than on Nantucket, where complex economic and geographic factors (namely, a bunch of rich people on an island) contributed to a wild spike last May. Overnight, gas prices rose 60 cents per gallon, causing folks to line up at one cheap station that, evidently, hadn't gotten the memo to start inflating. Meaning drivers on a 14-mile stretch of land were panicking to save, maybe, 10 bucks on a fill-up that would last them until Christmas. And that was before the economy took a digger. New England thrift, ye are alive and well.

FURNITURE: Basic Crate & Barrel

You finally finished law school and have your first adult salary. But all you own is a broken bed, a beer mug and a novelty condom dispenser. Thank God there's a Crate & Barrel around the corner. They've got moderately priced necessities like chairs and couches, plus lamps, rugs and cutlery. Grab some stylish glassware, as well, for those dinner parties you plan to throw. Voilà! Instant grown-up pad.

FURNITURE: High-End
Roche Bobois

Clients come here for the wow factor: Roche Bobois has breathtaking pieces from top contemporary designers worldwide. The season's colorful cushions forming a modular sofa are enough to lure you inside (it's like a futon for the jet set). Admittedly, they go best with a luxury pad, as evidenced by the prices.

GIFTS FOR GIRLS
The Flat of the Hill

Everyone knows someone who just can't be pleased. But even the most finicky female will melt over the offerings from this Beacon Hill shop. Designer handbags and unique books are the tip of the consumer iceberg, and the store's motto of "always changing, always fun" is alive and well in their scent selection. The boutique is ideal for gifts, and also for snagging a little something special for yourself.

GIFTS FOR GUYS
Apple Store

Nowadays, it's uncommon to see anyone riding the T sans white headphones. But for those unlucky guys who still lack apps to fill commuting's crushing void, Apple has the answer. The Boylston Street location sports three massive floors of tastefully bromantic gifts for your dude. He'll be sure to say iLove it.

HOME BOUTIQUE
Hudson Boston

Hudson's seabag pillows, vintage throws and woven rugs help transform a house into a magazine spread. The showroom turns over twice a year, keeping things fresh. Don't forget to visit the back wall, plastered with old photos and real love letters between a young couple in the 1940s. Like the furnishings, they're charming in every way.

MATERNITY STORE
Isis Maternity Boston

This Prudential store is an oasis for moms and moms-to-be learning the BabyBjörn lifestyle. Fun, informal classes cover everything from birth to breastfeeding to child development (dads even have their own workshops). A shop sports the finest range of strollers (Bugaboo, UPPAbaby, Maclaren), infant toiletries and safe, educational toys. But the best part is the social groups where you can bond with other parents over war stories about colic.

RECORD STORE
Newbury Comics

Long the essential retailer on the local music scene and still wicked after all these years, this chain has managed to thrive in the download age by stocking countless "collectibles," including action figures, novelty mugs and T-shirts. But they're still the place for vinyl releases, CDs and DVDs, both new and used.

ANTIQUE STORE
Marcoz Antiques

A mélange of dusty porcelain, 1700s sculpture and everything else that's beautiful and touched with experience, Marcoz is a historian's fantasy in the form of a Newbury Street boutique. Founded in 1972, the store's character is rooted in its owner's penchant for travel and high-end decorative arts. With an inventory ranging from reproduction prints to Louis XVI commodes, Marcoz makes other antique shops look like thrift stores.

SPORTING GOODS

Dick's Sporting Goods

The other day, we wanted to pick up a Jason Bay T-shirt on the way to the Sox game. Dick's Sporting Goods had that. While we were there, we decided to grab a glove in case of any stray foul balls. They had that, too. The Bruins were still in the playoffs then, so we needed a cap to show our support. Check. Oh, and we came across a pair of sweet running shoes and a deal on golf balls for the following weekend. See a pattern? For anything sports-related, Dick's is our place.

BARGAIN HUNTING
Wrentham Village Premium Outlets

In the spirit of the recession, the journey down to Wrentham Village suddenly sounds sensible. A must, really. Row after row of outlets from top labels boast discounts of 20 to 60 percent. Favorites include Barneys New York, Burberry, Ferragamo, Kate Spade and Theory. And because merchandise that doesn't move at department stores has been shipping to Wrentham sooner, the chance to score mega-deals has increased. One insider tip: Go early to miss the crowds—and to get a parking spot. It's like Christmas 365 days a year here.

BLOW OUT

Celeste Corcoran at Emerge

"The finish is just as important as cut and color," says Celeste Corcoran, whose beauty arsenal includes an array of dryers, flat irons and brushes. Corcoran uses products that work with heat (she likes Kerastase Ciment Thermique for smoothing and Shu Uemura Fiber Lift for volume) and makes sure hair is absolutely dry, because even a touch of dampness can lead to frizz. Another reason to go: The shampoo experience is euphoric, with scalp massages so vigorous they'll clear your sinuses. Questions about cord blood banking?

As an expectant parent, you may have heard that the stem cells found in your baby's umbilical cord blood can help treat over 80 chronic and acute diseases, and may treat many more in the future. No doubt you have a lot of questions and would like to learn more. Find answers online with NECBB or call us for more information.

At New England Cord Blood Bank, Inc. we've built a reputation as one of the most helpful resources for families considering umbilical cord blood banking. On our website you'll find a great deal of helpful information, including a video tour and family testimonials that help give you a clearer understanding of the process and benefits.

Ask about our new longer term, no-interest payment plans, which make choosing to save your baby's cord blood with us even easier.

"We're so lucky that we saved it . . . "

an experience of it (and learn a little something in the process) with Lauren Genatossio at Sarra, her South Boston loft. Genatossio will not only make you as pretty as a princess, she'll teach you her techniques. Her trick is to put you to work, right there in the studio, 'til you get it right. She'll even sort through your cosmetics case. Good-bye pastel shadows; hello fresh, new look.

MANICURE/ PEDICURE

Lisa Cao at MiniLuxe

Knowing that a mani might chip before its time is reason enough to forgo the service. Let Lisa Cao at MiniLuxe get you back in the habit. As an educator for OPI, Cao has the scoop on color trends and new products well in advance of the general public. Paired with MiniLuxe's modern digs, dedication to the clean and green, and fantastic selection of pick-me-ups (from hand cream and candles to bibs and bangles), she makes a potentially nail-biting experience a pleasurable one.

MASSAGE

Michael Moore at Moore Massage

Never mind sweet talk and cucumber-infused spring water. Sometimes you just need a work-over, no frills attached. Michael Moore understands that it's the muscles that matter, not scented oils and Enya. Just ask Boston Ballet's dancers, who rely on Moore for massages between practices and performances. If you can't secure an appointment with Moore, ask for Keith Stiles, who recently finished an eight-year stint traveling with Cirque du Soleil as their on-staff massage therapist, and who, years ago, was Moore's instructor.

MEN'S HAIRCUT & GROOMING

Barbershop Lounge

Don't force your stylist on him, no matter how good the cut. Give the guy a break and let him hang at the Barbershop Lounge, a grooming venue so manly that their regulars include players from every sports team in town. Although they focus on haircuts and shaves, services also include massages, facials and waxing. Like any place designed to hold a man's attention, Barbershop Lounge has plenty of flat-screen TVs (tuned into "the game," naturally) and even a pool table where clients can engage in a little friendly competition.

Worth the Trip | Rouge Cosmetics

Nars, Stila and Tocca are three reasons to make the trek to the North Shore and get to know Rouge Cosmetics. Owned by former department store cosmetics buyer Ann Supple Massey, Rouge focuses on acquainting customers with niche brands like Blinc and Glotherapeutics. Massey says, "We're all beauty junkies and must love every product before we'll sell it." Her artists work in other parts of the industry as well, doing makeup for photo shoots or fashion shows. They also book appointments at this light-filled boutique for weddings, proms and girls' nights.

SUBURBAN SALON

Ardan MedSpa + Salon

Relocated suburbanites who travel to Boston for treatments, take heart. Thanks to Ardan MedSpa + Salon, women to the west need no longer hunt for a parking spot on Newbury. This sleek and stylish Wellesley spot has the latest must-have services, from hair-smoothing therapy and brow threading to laser facials and Botox injections. Of course, you can get a top-notch cut and color, too. In fact, Ardan is so admired, there are gals who regularly make a reverse commute.

UPDO

Charles Maksou at Mizu

Trained in New York under celeb stylist John Sahag, Charles Maksou is perhaps best-known in Boston for his dry-cutting technique. Understanding how hair behaves in its natural state (i.e., dry) has made him quite the master at updos, as well. As the darling of runway fashion shows (there are more in town than you'd imagine), Maksou's approach to updos is high-concept and, in his words, "exotic."

WOMEN'S HAIRCUT

George Amaral at Salon Mario Russo

With 29 years in the biz, 19 with Mario Russo, George Amaral can execute any cut. Although Amaral admits that he has a penchant for short styles, long-haired ladies can rest assured that he's serious about his mission to make them more feminine, "the way Winona Ryder used to wear it, a little wispy at the sides and in back." Amaral works with a variety of tools, like razors and texturizing scissors, to take out weight. Right now, he's loving Rihanna's asymmetrical look, as well as Victoria Beckham's dark, pixie 'do.

WORKOUT CLOTHING

Lululemon Athletica

Since looking great is half the battle to feeling good, Lululemon Athletica is a gym rat's godsend. Sure, there are workout-wear lines that are less expensive, but none as comfortable or as cute. (Behold the countless women sporting the label outside the confines of the fitness club.) Boston now boasts its very own Lululemon boutique, complete with spacious fitting rooms, solicitous sales help and yoga-pant styles lined up on mannequins in denim-bar fashion. The guys' stuff is excellent, too.

Hair Colorist

Michael Albor at the Loft Salon + Day Spa

Michael Albor knows how to make blonde locks look better and last longer. "It's all about the low-lights," Albor says. He avoids the single-process all-over look (too artificial and hard to maintain) in favor of multiple shades. So whether your hair's auburn, red, chestnut or jet black, Albor knows that perfect color and dimension can only be achieved by hand. Ditch those boxes from CVS.

Bridal

GOWN | L'élite

Salwa Khoory, owner of L'élite, would never say "no" to a bride. Khoory aims to meet even the toughest request. Her atelier actually got its start restoring and redesigning heirloom wedding dresses, and she continues to offer such services, in addition to selling spectacular gowns that range in price from $1,500 to $15,000. The boutique recently moved into a bigger Newbury Street space, giving the Angel Sanchezes, Monique Lhuilliers and Vera Wangs more room to breathe.

BAND

Night Shift

Night Shift can do it all—fast, slow, smooth. The band's seven formally-trained musicians have played together for years, making them a well-oiled machine. They know 350 songs by heart from a range of artists (Rihanna, Stevie Wonder, Dave Matthews Band and the list goes on). And they add more all the time for a roster that's perfectly performed and stylistically diverse.

BRIDESMAID DRESS

Ann Taylor

You've dieted and exercised religiously for the happiest (and skinniest) day of your life, but your ladies-in-waiting can't be expected to do the same. Bridesmaids come in all shapes. Not to mention, most of them have budgets. We love Ann Taylor for their comprehensive sizes (00 to 18), simple styles, reasonable prices (under $200) and convenience. And the tasteful palette means no monstrous, neon frocks to ruin the photos.

CATERER
9 at Home

Many caterers plan too far ahead and have to go subzero. Which sounds a little Stouffer's for our tastes. Thankfully, the chefs at 9 at Home, the private dining arm of Barbara Lynch's culinary empire, prepare everything fresh. They use the same artisanal, farm-raised produce and meats that are sourced for Lynch's restaurants in dishes like crispy squash blossoms and honey-glazed figs. Dinner might upstage the best man's speech, but you won't hear any complaints.

ENGAGEMENT RINGS
Lux Bond & Green

Diamonds are a commodity—but an expensive one. So you don't want to be treated like a guy in the market for pork bellies. Lux Bond & Green not only delivers high-quality, competitively-priced sparklers, their service is impeccable, and their online diamond search lets you pull up stats for every type of stone, along with its cost. The tool is a gem, and the process completely flawless.

FAVOR
Charity Contribution

In this economy, the best presents give back. So do your guests a favor and make a contribution in their names to a charity you and your spouse hold dear, rather than gifting them with junk they don't need. If your wedding is small, consider choosing several causes to match their interests. A simple handwritten note tucked into an envelope at each place setting is a perfect way to communicate your intentions.

FLORIST
Winston Flowers

Transforming a space from ho-hum to hot takes more than just a few lilies. Winston Flowers is equipped to deck your hall with bazillions of blossoms (sourced from local farms with healthy practices and good working conditions). And the shop offers services that reach beyond the vegetation. Their design studio can create, plan and execute every element of the decor, from linens and drapes to custom carpeting and furniture, creating elaborate themes, from the enchanted garden to Opryland.

RECEPTION VENUE
ICA Boston

A Princess Bride theme is so last millennium. Nowadays, we adore the ICA's modern, sleek space with soaring glass walls and dramatic Boston Harbor backdrops. It's an edgy alternative to overdone gilt and dark woods, and with an array of areas, including a terrace and fully-equipped theater, there's ample opportunity for experimentation in the art of the party. Plus, while the bride and groom are busy posing for the cameras, guests can stroll the galleries.

HAIR AND MAKEUP

Ashley Brecken at Salon Marc Harris

Hair and makeup artist Ashley Brecken admits to a slightly obsessive nature: "I make sure hair number 152 is in place." This sweetheart of a stylist wants you to be wowed, both in the chair and at your golden wedding anniversary (it's all about the photos). Through a lengthy consultation, hands-on trial, copious notes, reassuring phone calls and plenty of pampering, Brecken creates soft makeup and loose locks that ensure you look like yourself. Only better.

INVITATIONS

Paper Source

DIY is the key idea when it comes to invitations these days. Paper Source supplies everything you need to get your craft on, from decorative, exotic papers to kits full of embellishments and accents. Ladies (and gents) lacking the Martha gene can take a workshop or watch how-to videos online. Consider inviting your girls, popping some bubbly and making a night of it.

PHOTOGRAPHER

Brian Phillips Photography

Weddings are full of eventful moments, so it makes sense to have a photojournalist document the day. Brian Phillips, who has covered subjects ranging from hard news to runway fashion, approaches each affair as a narrative, capturing a finely nuanced commentary of the bride, groom and bit players. His work is more than just a pretty picture (though rest assured, you'll look gorgeous); it's a drama, love story and an adventure all rolled into one.

PLANNER

Rafanelli Events

Bostonians aren't the only party-throwers who rely on Bryan Rafanelli to orchestrate an amazing event. Obama staffers called on our very own guru to organize and glamorize a number of festivities during inauguration week. Rafanelli and creative director Billy Evers are rightly famous for incorporating high-tech concepts into their innovative, unforgettable affairs. But they never forget that it's all in the details. We're betting they can even defuse your mother's fussing.

REGISTRY

Koo de Kir

You wouldn't be caught dead in a string of pearls and an apron, so why set your table like it's 1955? Skip the starched linens, cut crystal and gold-edged china in favor of pieces with verve. Try clean-lined Italia stemware or more delicate designs by Juliska, both of which perch perfectly on Chilewich mats. Add twiggy serving items by Michael Aram, and a ceramic antler chandelier up above, for a table as magical as your marriage.

SPA WEDDING PACKAGE

The Spa at Mandarin Oriental, Boston

You may not have planned a destination wedding to an exotic locale, or even a far-flung honeymoon, but a visit to the Spa at the Mandarin Oriental will more than compensate. Especially if you book the 700-square-foot Mandarin Suite. With its own stone sauna, soaking tub, two treatment tables and day bed, it's a spa within a spa. Add to that a hydrotherapy bath, tropical shower and full menu of services, including the acupressure facial, frankincense scrub and aroma stone massage.

TUXEDO

Classic Tuxedo

With extended pickup and drop-off periods, free sleeve- and pant-length tailoring, and extras-coordination (tie, vest, shoes, etc.), Classic Tuxedo gives grooms some much-needed breathing room. Current styles veer toward black jackets with a tapered, European fit, but all-American classics, like gold-buttoned navy blazers, can be ordered for guys getting hitched on the Vineyard. They even have a chocolate-brown tux for those celebrating their nuptials during the harvest months.

TREASURES

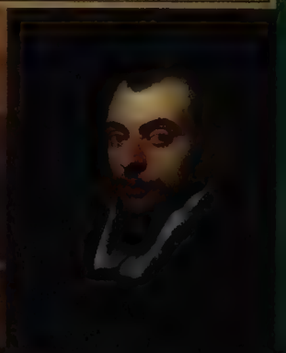
May 27 - August 28, 2009 • The Boston Athenæum

This summer, the Boston Athenæum exhibits treasures from its collection: paintings, sculptures, drawings, photographs, and manuscripts. Over 40 artists — American and European, from the 16th century to the present — are represented in the installation, adding to the wealth of objects already on public view on the Athenæum's first floor.

Since its founding in 1807, the Boston Athenæum has always collected a wide range of objects as well as books. This installation offers a rare chance to look closely at the treasures — both familiar favorites and seldom seen items — from the Athenæum's diverse collections.

The exhibition is free and open to the public.



Hours:
Monday: 9 a.m. - 8 p.m.
Tuesday - Friday: 9 a.m. - 5 p.m.

All About the Benjamins

FACE FACTS

NOT SO LONG ago people used primitive tools like e-mail and instant messaging to send each other amusing emoticons. Then Facebook upended the networking game. And a game it is, according to author and social butterfly Ben Mezrich. His new book, The Accidental Billionaires: The Founding of Facebook A Tale of Sex, Money, Genius and Betrayal, follows the trajectory of the two Harvard students who invented the service as a ploy to rise up from sexual destitution and meet girls. They never imagined it would become a global phenomenon and transform the lives of sedentary human beings everywhere. The Harvard Book Store hosts Mezrich as he discusses this true story of technology, business acumen and loads of money at the Brattle Theatre on July 16.

Mystic Moment

If you couldn't make it down to Bonnaroo, get your kicks at the second annual Mystic River Music Festival for Green Awareness on July 18. Held at the Condon Shell in Medford, the event showcases seven bands, including the Sea Monsters and Go Dog Go. Keeping with the theme, it features an organic beer-and-wine garden, eco-friendly vendors and activities for all ages. Triumph the Insult Comic Dog will not be there to make jokes about "Bonnapoo" (although that's not a bad name for a "green" fertilizer).

Lease on Life

Returning Tenants After opening the production's 12-year run and starring in the Hollywood film, Anthony Rapp comes back to Rent to perform "Seasons of Love" for the 525,600th time. He and two other original castmates bring the Tony- and Pulitzer-Prize-winning musical to the Colonial Theatre July 14–26. Rapp returns as the struggling young director, Mark, a role for which he is so well-known that other directors fear audiences won't be able to break the association. However, true sophisticates will always see him as Daryl Coopersmith from Adventures in Babysitting.

Angels & Demons ★ Are these Dan Brown books as stupid as the movies they've spawned? I guess you can call Angels & Demons a step up from 2006's unspeakably turgid The Da Vinci Code, if only because it's more frantic and unhinged than that burnished, lethargic yak-fest. This boondoggle begins with a time bomb full of anti-matter (yes, kids, "anti-matter") stashed somewhere in Vatican City, and things only get more preposterous from there. Late game developments in this picture provoked peals of laughter the likes of which I've seldom heard at comedies. I daresay it's Ron Howard's funniest film since Splash. Tom Hanks reprises his role as surly Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon, with his charisma tamped down flatter than his unfortunate hairstyle. He wanders around pointing at statues and mumbling obscure art history footnotes while everyone else marvels at his intellectual prowess. Howard cranks up the Gregorian chant and keeps the lighting dim and the mood glum, but the material's inherent silliness throws the ponderous self-seriousness into sharp comic relief. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Away We Go ★ ½ This is my least favorite kind of movie: one in which nothing is learned from others and no common humanity is shared. There's just a succession of straw-man arguments for a sad worldview that's established in the beginning and remains unchallenged all the way to the end credits. Literary supercouple Dave Eggers and Vendela Vida make the case for their own moral and intellectual superiority by penning roles for John Krasinski and Maya Rudolph, who play two go-nowhere goofballs having a baby. They decide to travel the country to find parents to model themselves after, only to realize that—despite having nothing to say or precious little to offer—they're much better off than all the rest of the cartoonish losers. It's a noxious ode to generational entitlement, and I swear, if I ever see another "soulful" shot of a movie character staring blankly into the camera while twee acoustic guitar music plays on the soundtrack, I'm going to travel back in time and kill Zach Braff before Garden State ever happens. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Brothers Bloom ★★ ½ Despite fine performances and good intentions, writer/director Rian Johnson's sophomore effort suffers from a fatal case of the cutes. It does, however, earn credit for exploring the gray areas between good storytelling and bad grifting, wondering aloud whether sometimes the right kind of lie can be helpful, even therapeutic. Adrien Brody and Mark Ruffalo star as the titular siblings, working globetrotting con games full of obscure literary references and heavy symbolism. A bored, shut-in heiress (Rachel Weisz) could be either their latest mark or their newest partner, and the movie keeps you wondering for longer than perhaps necessary. The snazzy couture, snarky music cues, slow-motion interludes and widescreen compositions suggest that Johnson has been watching too many Wes Anderson flicks. For a movie so concerned with the space between illusion and reality, a more grounded, less whimsical approach would have sufficed. (In the suburbs.)

Cheri ★★ ½ There's a mini Dangerous Liaisons reunion going on in Stephen Frears' latest. The director gets back with acid-tongued scribe Christopher Hampton, here adapting another French bedroom saga for star Michelle Pfeiffer. But the past 21 years have taken their toll, as Pfeiffer now plays a sassy, brassy woman of a certain age. (You know you're getting old when Michelle Pfeiffer is getting Glenn Close roles.) Culled from two novels, Hampton's surprisingly slender script begins with Pfeiffer's aging courtesan Lea agreeing to babysit slatternly Kathy Bates' wayward, dissolute son, Cheri (Rupert Friend). It's obvious that these two are crazy for each other, but societal mores won't allow it, so one hastily arranged marriage later, we're watching Michelle Pfeiffer elegantly suffer her way through a belle époque riff on He's Just Not That Into You. Frears is savvy enough to toy with his front-loaded iconography, using cinematographer Darius Khondji's harsh natural lighting to turn this twisted farce into a meditation on Hollywood's horrific treatment of aging actresses. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Drag Me to Hell ★★★ Taking a breather from his Spider-Man tent poles, Sam Raimi returns to his Evil Dead roots with this high-spirited goof that's about as classy and sophisticated as the title would lead you to believe. Good sport Alison Lohman stars as a perky young banker who makes the mistake of denying a mortgage extension to a gypsy witch doctor. Faster than you can say "ancient curse," Raimi is off and running with dizzying corkscrew camera moves, shrieking sound effects and a cheerfully sophomoric procession of gross-outs. At times, Raimi, who penned the script with his brother Ivan, seems to be having a private con-

MANN UP

Johnny Depp shines as legendary outlaw John Dillinger.

Public Enemies

Peter Mountain

IN 1933, AFTER SERVING MORE than eight years in jail, John Dillinger was released. He discovered that the world had changed.

That's pretty much the long and the short of Michael Mann's enthralling, audacious Public Enemies, an art-house curio disguised as a summer blockbuster. This is a film about a man out of place—a relic from the recent past hell-bent on wreaking as much havoc as possible upon the present.

cowboy fighting manicured mobsters and educated G-Men. For a gangster movie, Public Enemies is one hell of a Western.

Pay no attention to the topcoats, Tommy-guns or fedoras, as the film is more Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid than Angels With Dirty Faces. Like Kris Kristofferson's Billy or, more recently, Brad Pitt's Jesse James, Depp's Dillinger is a man made obsolete. Living in the moment as if the next might be his last, Dillinger has no future and no past. He's the sum total of Mann's career-long existential obsessions, without the usual morbid introspection—there is only the now.

It catches up with Dillinger, as things always do in Mann pictures. Dillinger taunts the authorities, but they've got technology on their side. A homuncular devil named J. Edgar Hoover (brilliantly embodied by Billy Crudup) just spear-headed something called the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and he's got an army of pointy-headed college boys using newfangled scientific methods—not to mention illegal wiretaps and torture—to bring down outlaws.

Hoover also has an ace in the hole named Melvin Purvis. Played by Christian Bale with a smarmy smirk and distinct absence of empathy, he's the careerist bulldog who shot Pretty Boy Floyd in the back, and Purvis has the smarts and the technological savvy to chase Dillinger down wherever he hides. Forget Terminator 3, this is the Bale movie that should've been called Rise of the Machines.

The mob has no use for Dillinger anymore, either. Giving a tour of a telephone bunker where numbers-running rules supreme—a location conspicuously photographed to match the FBI's wiretap center—one of gangster Frank Nitti's goons explains that whatever the hotshot Dillinger can steal from a bank after months of planning and preparation, they make in a day with their new interstate operation.

The game has passed Dillinger by.

Yet somehow he soldiers on, winning over the public with anachronistic brio and every-man appeal. Depp has a naturally conspiratorial relationship with the audience—it's pretty much impossible for us not to like him. (And it's nice to see him tone down the usual clown-show and layer in some subtlety.)

As the only person savvier at manipulating public opinion than Hoover, Dillinger delivers press conferences from jail, and every time he's incarcerated, he comes up with yet another reckless, brilliant way to escape.

> For a gangster movie, Public Enemies is one hell of a Western.

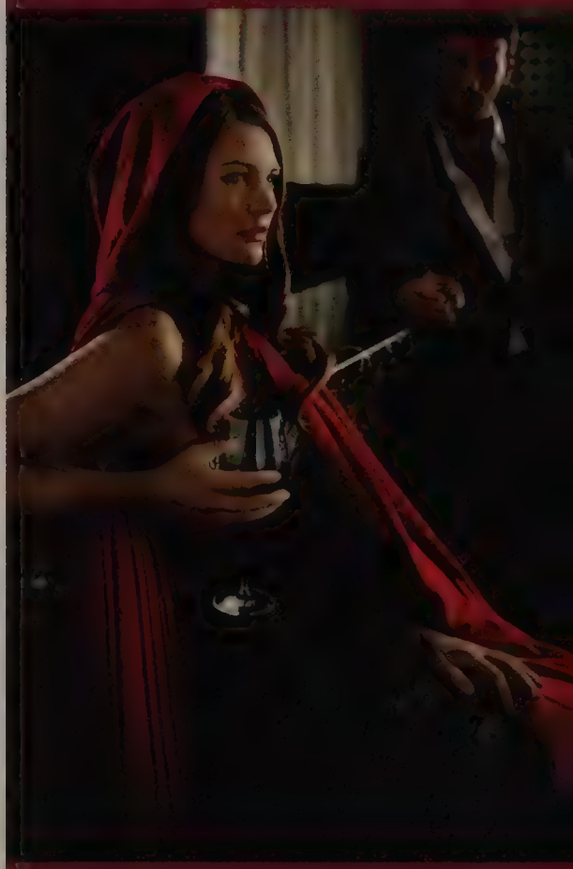
In Mann's boldest, most controversial stroke, form becomes content in Public Enemies. Dillinger has reemerged into an alien landscape he can't understand, and thus Mann shoots the entire film in hand-held, hi-definition video. There's not an establishing shot to be found or any of the pretty trappings of the era we'd expect from the scenery. The movie looks raw, aggressive and, sometimes, awfully ugly.

It's also strange to see 1930s icons in period dress, while also in overlit, trembling CNN-type video, surrounded by inconsistent color timing and blurs from the popping light sources. Somehow this insane choice lends a freakish immediacy to Public Enemies, as if it's happening in our time instead of the distant past. I spent the entire film on the edge of my seat, even though we already know Dillinger's fate and the ending is a foregone conclusion.

There's just something startling and crazy about the delivery method, the intensity of Mann's direction, his daring choices and absurdly violent set-pieces. The bureau's notoriously botched raid on Dillinger's woodsy hideout in Little Bohemia becomes an epic in miniature—a blank-slate scene marked only by the illumination of muzzle-flashes and the cracks of shotgun blasts ripping through tree trunks.



Public Enemies is a ballsy, complicated movie. The deliberately off-putting visual style is challenging, even alienating, yet somehow makes perfect sense after you talk it out at the bar afterward. This may be some sort of breakthrough. ✖✖✖ test to see how many icky fluids, flies and eyeballs he can land in Lohman's mouth. Lately, horror movies have become so downbeat and nasty that the exuberant showmanship here lends a pleasingly retro vibe. Drag Me has the cheeky, morality play spirit of Tales From the Crypt and an ending that's just about perfect. (In the suburbs.)

Easy Virtue ★★ Director Stephan Elliott's supremely annoying version of Noël Coward's 1926 play feels like two hours of being poked in the ribs by somebody who desperately wants to make sure you understand just how funny everything is. Poor Jessica Biel flounders way out of her league as a sophisticated American racecar driver who suffers the misfortune of marrying into a family of miserable English harpies. Kristin Scott Thomas costars as the brutal matriarch, trading insults with Colin Firth's depressed WWI veteran dad. Shrewish sisters Kimberley Nixon and Katherine Parkinson have plenty of put-downs of their own, while Biel's chinless hubby (Ben Barnes) simply shrugs and leaves her to the wolves. It's a shame that Elliott has no faith in the source material, as he constantly undercuts Coward's elegant prose with kooky camera angles and obnoxious, anachronistic soundtrack selections like "Car Wash." You end up wishing the movie would just leave you alone. (In the suburbs.)

The Hangover ★★★ This summer's out-of-nowhere blockbuster boasts a can't-miss premise: after a bachelor party gone wrong, three addled buddies wake up to a sea of Las Vegas sleaze, with no idea what happened to the groom. A bleary-eyed detective story follows, as these staggering malcontents attempt to piece together the previous evening. Director Todd Phillips, who helmed the similar man-child favorite Old School, still hasn't mastered the pacing required for such screwball comedy, but his cast comes to the rescue. The Office's Ed Helms once again uses his outward dorkiness to conceal a deep-seated anger, and star Bradley Cooper can't help but bring an unpleasant aggression to a character presumably intended to be much more endearing. The off-kilter energy is hammered home by alt-comedy icon Zach Galifianakis, who steals every scene not nailed down with his deadpan, wildly inappropriate reactions and perverted asides. The movie isn't always as funny as it likes to think it is, but this trio makes it feel dangerous. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Monsters vs. Aliens ★★★ Like a snarky little offshoot of Pixar's crew of bona fide artistes, DreamWorks Animation tends to specialize in pop-culture references and dated inside jokes aimed at the long-suffering parents in the audience. Its latest endeavor will never be confused with Wall-E, but at least it's a cohesive piece that boasts a charmingly 50s' retro sensibility and some dazzling 3-D effects. Reese Witherspoon voices an unlucky bride struck by a meteorite, now horrified to find herself growing seven stories tall and quarantined in a secret government facility with a bunch of icky monsters. Once aliens attack, these outcasts become America's last line of defense. There's some very funny voice work by Hugh Laurie as the world's smartest cockroach, while Seth Rogen is typecast as an amorphous, dimwitted blob. As was bound to happen sooner or later, Stephen Colbert plays the president. See the IMAX 3-D presentation, which distracts from any screenwriting weaknesses with a healthy dose of eye candy. (In the suburbs.)

The Soloist ★★ Robert Downey Jr. stars as L.A. Times columnist Steve Lopez, a motor-mouthed depressive who befriends a homeless, schizophrenic musical prodigy, played by Jamie Foxx. Lopez writes an inexplicably popular series of columns, congratulating himself for befriending Foxx's babbling musician. This scores him a book deal and some journalism awards, but poor Foxx is still out on the street, mumbling to himself and playing Beethoven on a broken violin. Susannah Grant's screenplay spends a moment or two wondering how much of this "friendship" is really opportunistic exploitation on Lopez's part, but the movie is too cowardly to stay there for very long. The Soloist moves about in a muddle, never quite sure of what story it's supposed to be telling. Flashbacks to Foxx's traumatic childhood and mental breakdown are interlaced with mundane details about Downey's broken marriage, until it becomes one of those movies where the minority figure's tragic fall is just another way for the callous white guy to learn important life lessons. (In the suburbs.)

Star Trek ★★★ ½ What a wonderful surprise. It takes serious gall to recast characters as iconic as Captain Kirk and Mr. Spock with fresh-faced barely-knowns. Sure, there's a shiny coat of CGI paint and everybody's impossibly good-looking, but director JJ Abrams has captured the upbeat sense of adventure that defined Gene Roddenberry's original 1960s' series. More so than any Trek project in decades, this one captures the camaraderie, the easy humor and, most important, the swagger that we associate with the headstrong Kirk and his logical, pointy-eared pal. Much like Casino Royale, Abrams' Star Trek finds ingenious ways to serve up familiar pleasures. Rare for a landscape dominated by dour popcorn blockbusters, this one isn't afraid to be fun. All the phaser battles, sexy green girls and transporter beam antics you'd expect are present, just with slightly unexpected spins. The film's rousing finale ends with the Enterprise crew at last assembled and warping off to what we can only hope will be a happy series of sequels. May they live long and prosper. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Sugar ★★★ ½ Gorgeous and understated, the latest film from Half Nelson writer/directors Anna Boden and Ryan Fleck follows Miguel "Sugar" Santos (Algenis Perez Soto), a promising pitcher from the Dominican Republic who finds himself ground in the gears of Major League Baseball's recruiting system. Avoiding what we've come to expect from a typical sports movie, Sugar has no interest in clichéd climaxes like a ninth-inning strikeout. It's a film about the day-to-day mechanics of a sports industry and what it feels like to be an outsider in America. With a tenuous grasp on the English language, Sugar and his teammates find themselves dropped in a small baseball-crazy town in Iowa, and the inevitable culture clash is rendered with uncommon sensitivity. In fact, my one quibble with Sugar is that the film may be a bit too sensitive. This is such a gentle, compassionate picture, a little crassness may have given it more dramatic punch. But how often does one complain that a movie is too thoughtful? (In the suburbs.)

Deserves Your Enthusiasm

Workin' It Larry David stars and delivers his lovable sarcasm in Woody Allen's comedy Whatever Works.

Summer Hours ★★★ ½ French writer/director Olivier Assayas often suffers from a pedantic streak a mile wide. But this quiet, devastating family drama plays to his strengths, with three squabbling siblings sorting out what to do with their late mother's estate. Playing the heartsick eldest, Charles Berling attempts to keep the family's posh country compound intact as a refuge for future generations, while younger Juliette Binoche and Jeremie Renier just want to cash in and move on with their cosmopolitan lives. Assayas pays as much attention to the objects in the frame as he does to these characters, as he lavishes furniture or the artwork on the walls with symbolic importance. Saying a lot, but never out loud, the film allows the dispersal and auction of these material things to stand in for the dissolution of a family over time. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Taking of Pelham 123 ★★ Director Tony Scott's pointless remake of Joseph Sargent's 1974 classic keeps the basic premise, as a scenery-chewing John Travolta hijacks a Manhattan subway car, much to the chagrin of Denzel Washington's weary, everyman dispatcher. But this slick redux misplaces the attitude, which is everything. The original wasn't much of a nail-biter but still remains a cherished cult favorite thanks to its time-capsule vision of a crumbling, battle-weary New York City. Scott's hyperactive version employs web cams, Wi-Fi gadgets, freeze frames and swooping helicopter shots of overwrought car crashes to oversell a story that was already foolproof. Only James Gandolfini, playing a disgraced mayor waiting out the end of his term, musters a level of droll cynicism that matches the previous picture. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Terminator Salvation ★ At least now we know why Christian Bale was so angry. A scant 25 years after James Cameron's low-budget thriller made a superstar out of California's future governor, a hack director who preposterously insists on calling himself McG has at last run the franchise into the ground. Bale barks a single, repetitive note as John Connor, humanity's humorless savior, who, thanks to time travel's pretzel logic, must rescue his teenage father (Anton Yelchin) from a lot of noisy, clanking robots and some patently offensive Holocaust allusions. There's also much ado about a befuddled cyborg, blandly played by Sam Worthington, who seems as confused as we are as to what purpose his character serves. Lacking a clear antagonist or any discernable reason to exist, Terminator Salvation suffers from a parched, ugly color palette and offers no relief from the grim funeral tone. (At Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Transformers: Revenge of the Fallen NO STARS Michael Bay has outdone himself and made a movie bigger, louder, longer and dumber than the godforsaken original Transformers. Again, there's no sense of joy or whimsy, nothing but the pulverizing fetishization of militaristic, alpha-male privilege. All women are spray-tanned skanks dressed like strippers, and every minority is a grotesque, ineffectual cartoon. An early set-piece is devoted to savoring the destruction of a library. Then we meet "Amos 'n' Android"—comic-relief robots modeled on monkeys who speak jive and flash gold teeth. (Bay's big punch line is that they can't read!) Eventually, even President Obama gets dragged into this mess, here ridiculed for attempting diplomacy with gigantic killer robots. Luckily, our heroes know better, so when a bespectacled, articulate representative of the new administration argues for transparency and accountability, the good guys promptly throw him out of a plane and go save the world by invading a Middle Eastern country. There's also a robot with enormous wrecking balls dangling from his crotch that serve as destructive testicles. This is what you asked for, America. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Up ★★★★ The geniuses at Pixar Animation Studios have done it again. This tall tale of an aging widower (voiced by Ed Asner) flying his house to South America with helium balloons has no right to be so emotionally powerful, but writer/director Pete Docter weighs down the bizarre flights of fancy with sharp human sadness. Somehow the movie manages to include a 13-foot female bird named Kevin, an army of talking dogs and some spectacular action sequences while never losing sight of the moving human drama. Breathtakingly animated, Up has more strange and beautiful images than can possibly be listed here, but perhaps none more so than the crumbling old home, born aloft by thousands of brilliantly colored balloons. It's a ridiculous conceit that pays off rich metaphorical dividends, as our protagonist must learn that it's time to let go. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Whatever Works ★★ ½ So there's this older, balding Jewish guy with glasses. Kind of a nebbish, he's obsessed with death, hates people and spends most days walking around his beloved New York City suffering panic attacks while obsessing about the intellectual degeneration of the human race and the meaninglessness of our existence. By all standards physically unattractive, he still manages to spew so many brilliant one-liners that he scores the carnal affections of a hot, up-and-coming actress who happens to be a fraction of his age. Have you figured out that we're in a Woody Allen movie yet? Whatever Works, which is, by my count, Allen's 39th stint as a writer/director, has nothing new to offer. It's stagey, half-baked and overly reliant on lazy caricatures and cheap zingers. But I'd be lying if I said it doesn't have its fair share of laughs. Credit most of them to star Larry David, whose sandpaper delivery lends a refreshing edge of aggression to extremely familiar territory. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

X-Men Origins: Wolverine ★ After an acrimonious split with series director Bryan Singer following 2003's nifty X2: X-Men United, 20th Century Fox seemed lost on how to proceed with their superhero franchise. First X3: The Last Stand scrapped Singer's carefully developed allegories of alienation and killed off the most interesting characters, and now Wolverine seeks to demystify the tragic history of Hugh Jackman's cigar-chomping scene-stealer. As far as revelations go, the movie doesn't offer much that wasn't already covered in X2. The only surprises here are the dour mood, shoddy special effects and complete absence of levity. Directed by Gavin Hood, who recently helmed the rancid war on terror melodrama Rendition, Wolverine takes itself remarkably seriously for a movie about a man with knives coming out of his knuckles. It's a somber affair, and Jackman is forced to tamp down the character's roguish Han Solo charms in favor of a lot of brooding, scowling and howling. No more of these, please. (In the suburbs.)

Music { PAUL ROBICHEAU }

PRIME-TIMER

Will Dailey gets recognized for his resonant folk-pop charm.

Will Dailey plays the Beachcomber July 24 and the Rock and Blues Cruise on July 31.

Liz Linder

WILL DAILEY spends a lot of time in airports, where strangers often ask, "Where do I know you from?" He tends to answer them with a question, "Are you from Boston?" rather than identify himself as the singer who performed on the TV drama CSI: NY with star Gary Sinise playing in his band.

"People say, 'What's it like to pretend Gary Sinise plays bass?' and I'm like, 'Actually, he plays bass very well, and I sat in his trailer and he learned [the song 'Rise'] note for note,'" Dailey says. "His character has played bass in the past as his outlet for blowing off steam, and I called him down to sit in. But it's pretty funny that I play myself on a fictional show. How does that work out?"

A lot has worked out for Dailey, 32, over the last few years. In addition to on-camera cameos on CSI: NY and the soap opera As the World Turns, his songs have been heard on such shows as NCIS, 90210 and Gossip Girl. TV placements through a CBS Records deal have put the 2006 Boston Music Award winner for Male Singer/Songwriter on the national stage.

"The TV thing's kind of surreal," says Dailey, who grew up in Andover influenced by Neil Young via his folksinger stepfather and the Led Zeppelin he heard from his father.

"If [the Who's songwriter] Pete Townshend has the title intro for all these TV shows and Bob Dylan's selling Cadillacs, it's OK for me to go on CSI," Dailey says. "That's the norm these days. It used to be, 'I can hear this song all over the radio.' Now it's, 'I can hear this song on Grey's Anatomy,' or 'I can hear this in a movie,' or 'I can see a Corvette racing down a rainy street.'"

Executives at CBS Records certainly heard something in his songs, signing Dailey in 2006 as the revived label's first artist. "There are three people who work there, and they run it like an indie label," Dailey says. "I can get anyone on the phone at any time or walk in and say, 'Here's my idea for how to sell my music.' And they're like, 'Great idea, let's do it.' It's the perfect environment for me, having come from a do-it-yourself mentality."

> "If Bob Dylan's selling Cadillacs, it's OK for me to go on CSI."

Dailey's biggest idea was to sell short bursts of his music online as digital EPs under a series called Torrent. The first two volumes, Fashion of Distraction and By the Blue Hills, have just been combined into a 13-song CD. "It's letting fans join me in the creative process as it's coming," he says. "It was one of those days where you say, 'What makes me the happiest?' and that was writing songs. So I finagled a way for my label to let me do that."

Dailey spins consistently effortless and resonant folk-pop tunes. Each half of Torrent Vol. 1 and 2 complements the other nicely, even though the EPs sport different themes.

Fashion of Distraction reflects the '70s influence of the Byrds, and even features their 12-string guitarist Roger McGuinn on "Peace of Mind." By the Blue Hills adds more hometown-flavored pop, with cameos from singers Kay Hanley (Letters to Cleo) and Tanya Donelly (Throwing Muses), guitarists Elliot Easton (The Cars) and Duke Levine, and accordionist Tim Brennan (Dropkick Murphys).

The Rivals—Dailey's core band of guitarist Matt Pynn, bassist Joe McMahon and drummer Dave Brophy—provide a consistent link as well, on record and onstage. They're making summer rounds at the Beachcomber in Wellfleet on July 24 and the Rock and Blues Cruise on Boston Harbor on July 31.

"I'm pretty excited for that boat cruise thing," Dailey says. "I think we're going to bring upright bass and acoustic guitars and start playing on the bow from minute one while people are walking onto the boat." In other words, it'll be much less formal than TV.

"There's a whole new world out there than the world I grew up thinking that I wanted to be in," Dailey says from L.A., where he's recording new material. "It's an interesting career and an amazing adventure. I got to do Farm Aid last year [at the Comcast Center], and I'm singing with Willie Nelson. There's this weird level of success I have that keeps surprising me every day. And these are tough times, so I feel blessed to have what I have." ✖✖✖

Escape Artists

The Boys Are Back in Town

The Beantown rockers Boys Like Girls hit the big time in 2006 with "The Great Escape," opening for the All-American Rejects and Butch Walker, and capturing the hearts of teenaged girls and scenesters alike. These days, the platinum-selling quartet is putting the finishing touches on their new album Love Drunk, due in September, and traveling the country on their second headlining tour. Alongside the Academy Is, Gym Class Heroes and others, BLG takes it home on July 24 at Suffolk Downs.

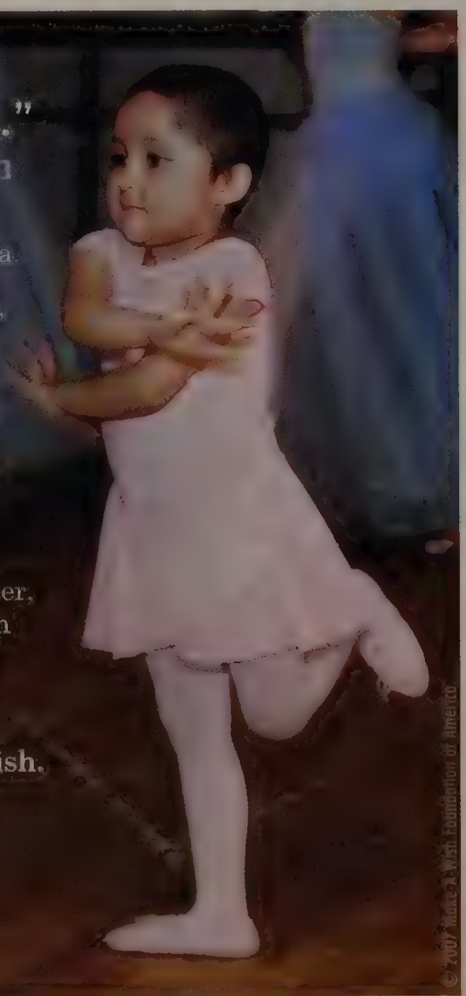
"I wish to be a ballerina."
Cassandra, age 3



Cassie always wanted to be a ballerina.

Thanks to Make-A-Wish® volunteers, she got her wish and danced with a troupe of ballet dancers. For a few precious moments, Cassie forgot about her life-threatening medical condition. She will never forget the people who helped make her wish come true.

To make a donation, become a volunteer, or refer a child, call the Make-A-Wish Foundation® of Massachusetts at 617-367-WISH (9474).

We all have the power to grant a wish.

Home-team Heroes Since the birth of the great American pastime, baseball players have been heaped with attention. Yet even stars would be nothing without the loyal devotees who pack the stands regardless of weather or famous curses. Photographers Bill Chapman, Jose Luis Villegas and Ernest C. Withers turn their lenses to the streets with Baseball Faces, a look at the fans who are the real heart and soul of the game. Catch their work at the Panopticon Gallery through Sept. 14.

Chances Are You've Been Sitting on a Cure for Cancer

Before Lance, even before LeMond, there was the PMC, a 190-mile bike-a-thon that brought cycling to the American consciousness. Since 1980, the PMC has raised almost $240 million for cancer research. Today, 100 percent of every rider-raised dollar goes directly to that cause.

PMC 2009 – August 1 & 2 – 6,000 cyclists from 36 states and 6 countries will ride. Last year, the PMC raised $35 million for cancer research at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute. Are you ready to take the Pan-Mass Challenge?

IMPROPER Sightings!

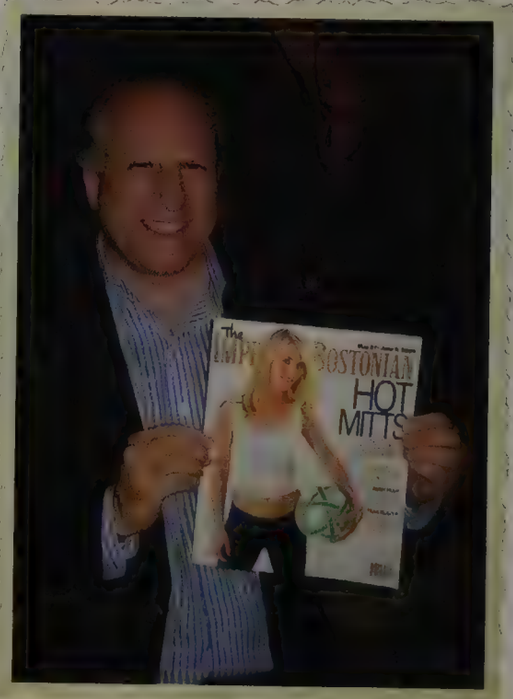
ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER DRESSED LIKE A NINJA TURTLE AT PIZZA DAY, HELD JULY 10 IN SÃO PAULO, BRAZIL

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.



On a trip to the Bahamas, the Katz family proved themselves to be an intrepid bunch. Granted, adventure is no problem when you have nine lives.

Danielle Dang and Aaron Tjoa were all smiles atop Swaziland's Execution Rock. In the distance, you can see Lethal Injection Meadow and the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Mountains.

Allyson Murphy and Bill Brown took us dirt biking through the Las Vegas desert. Turns out, the ride's far more pleasant when you're not bound and gagged in the trunk of a Town Car.

"Harvard Business Review" editor Adi Ignatius is either squeamish about our magazine's texture or making a clever play on our "Hot Mitts" cover-line. You decide.

HOW GREAT THOU ART

Ars Longa, Party Brevis

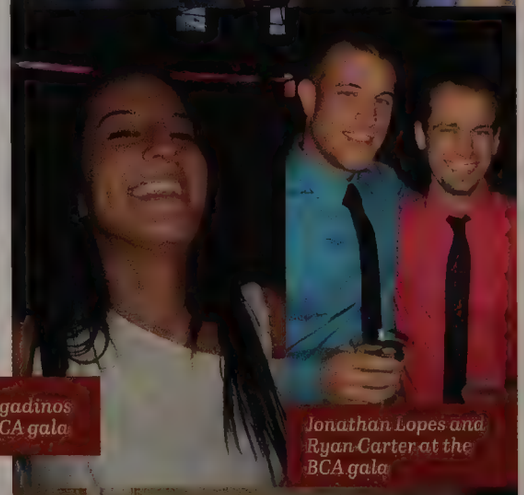
Silent auctions are common enough at charity gigs, but silent discos? Not so much. A room with a DJ spinning music that only people wearing headphones could hear was just one of the delightful oddities at the Boston Center for the Arts' gala, held at the Cyclorama.

The others included a tableau vivant, an art station where guests could channel their inner Picasso, assorted performances and a circular bar where the Cold River vodka flowed like... well, a cold river.

Prominent among the throng was the event's honoree, Joyce Kulhawick, and such terrible twosomes as Philip Lovejoy and Jim Moses, Michael "Missy" Carter and David Rousseau, David Hacin and Tim Grafft, and Jonathan Lopes and Ryan Carter, plus birthday girl Tina Lagadinos (who turned 22 that day), Boston Ballet head honcho Mikko Nissenen, Commonwealth Shakespeare's Steve Maler, grande dame Anne Kaye and the eternally lovely Betsy Hall.

In short, it was a thoroughly entertaining evening, and anyone who didn't enjoy themselves tremendously needs to have their fun-o-meter checked.

Musical Chairs



I didn't actually see anyone wearing an emerald necklace at the gala for the Boston Landmarks Orchestra, which had a Frederick Law Olmsted theme and was held at the Taj.

However, there was lots of other glittery stuff around the throats, wrists and fingers of guests like the stunning Marilyn Keane, ambassador Swanee Hunt, her gorgeous niece, Leah Hunt-Hendrix, judge Nonnie Burns, brunette bombshell Alecia Winn, redheaded thoroughbred Sukey Forbes Bigham (who designed her own necklace), front-row witness to history Joan Kennedy, the delightfully bubbly Donna Storer (whose ancestor-in-law, Robert Treat Paine, lived in a house that Olmsted landscaped), the lovely Stephanie Warburg, silver fox Pamela Humphrey and one woman who said, "I'm wearing my mommy cougar dress."

Following drinks and dinner, the orchestra premiered a piece it commissioned about Olmsted's life, and the goodie bag contained a beautiful book about him, along with a CD and a gift certificate for 25 bucks to a Newbury Street hair salon (not that 25 bucks goes very far at a Newbury Street hair salon).

Silent disco at the BCA gala

Tina Lagadinos at the BCA gala

Jonathan Lopes and Ryan Carter at the BCA gala

Alecia Winn and Leah Hunt-Hendrix at the BLO gala

Tiffany Dowd at the MFA gala

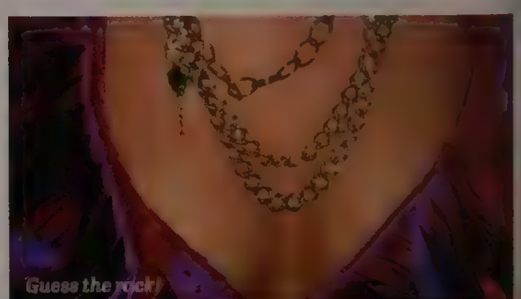
Eric Lee[illegible] and Em[illegible] Copema[illegible] at the MFA [illegible]

The evening's most memorable remark: A woman from a horsey suburb said, "My kids have never been on the town's police blotter, but my dogs have. Twice."

Who Was That Masked Man?

Despite the fact that it makes sipping cocktails unnecessarily difficult, there's nothing quite like a masked ball, which is what the Council of the Museum of Fine Arts threw, and in rare style, for its summer gala.

Of course, the museum has Sargent's murals, a hall of old masters and a pillar-lined rotunda to work with, but beyond the backdrop, there was an excellent crowd that included the likes of yoga goddess Jasmine Punzalan, party pair Jodi and Eric Saarmaa, exquisite thing Tiffany Dowd and her dashing husband, JB (OK, so some people did take their masks off), the aptly named Swing Robertson, Charlie's Angel lookalike No. 1 Darcy Jameson, the ridiculously handsome Chris Hesse, BSO babe Nina Jung, the swanlike Katie Rutledge, smoking hot shutterbug Eric Levin and Charlie's Angel lookalike No. 2 Emily Copeman, dreamgirl AJ Williams and one woman who said (apropos of I'm not sure what), "The last thing I need is a horizontal stripe across my ass."



However, the evening's funniest exchange was:

"I love your mask."

"Thanks. I use it to rob banks."

Another Free T-Shirt!

IT'S ALL ABOUT THE INGREDIENTS.

You know that the best dish relies on the perfect combination of ingredients. Here at Dadgar, we're all about the right ingredients too—insurance ingredients, that is. Specializing in restaurant insurance for over 25 years, Dadgar reduces your costs while eliminating gaps in coverage.

Let us prepare the perfect insurance package for your tastes.

DJ'S AT THE GARDEN

"We've been with Dadgar since day one at DJ's and I have never been tempted to change agents. Anowsh, [the owner], is an expert in the restaurant insurance industry and his staff are a pleasure to work with. Though they save us money, they do not cut corners in the quality of our coverage."

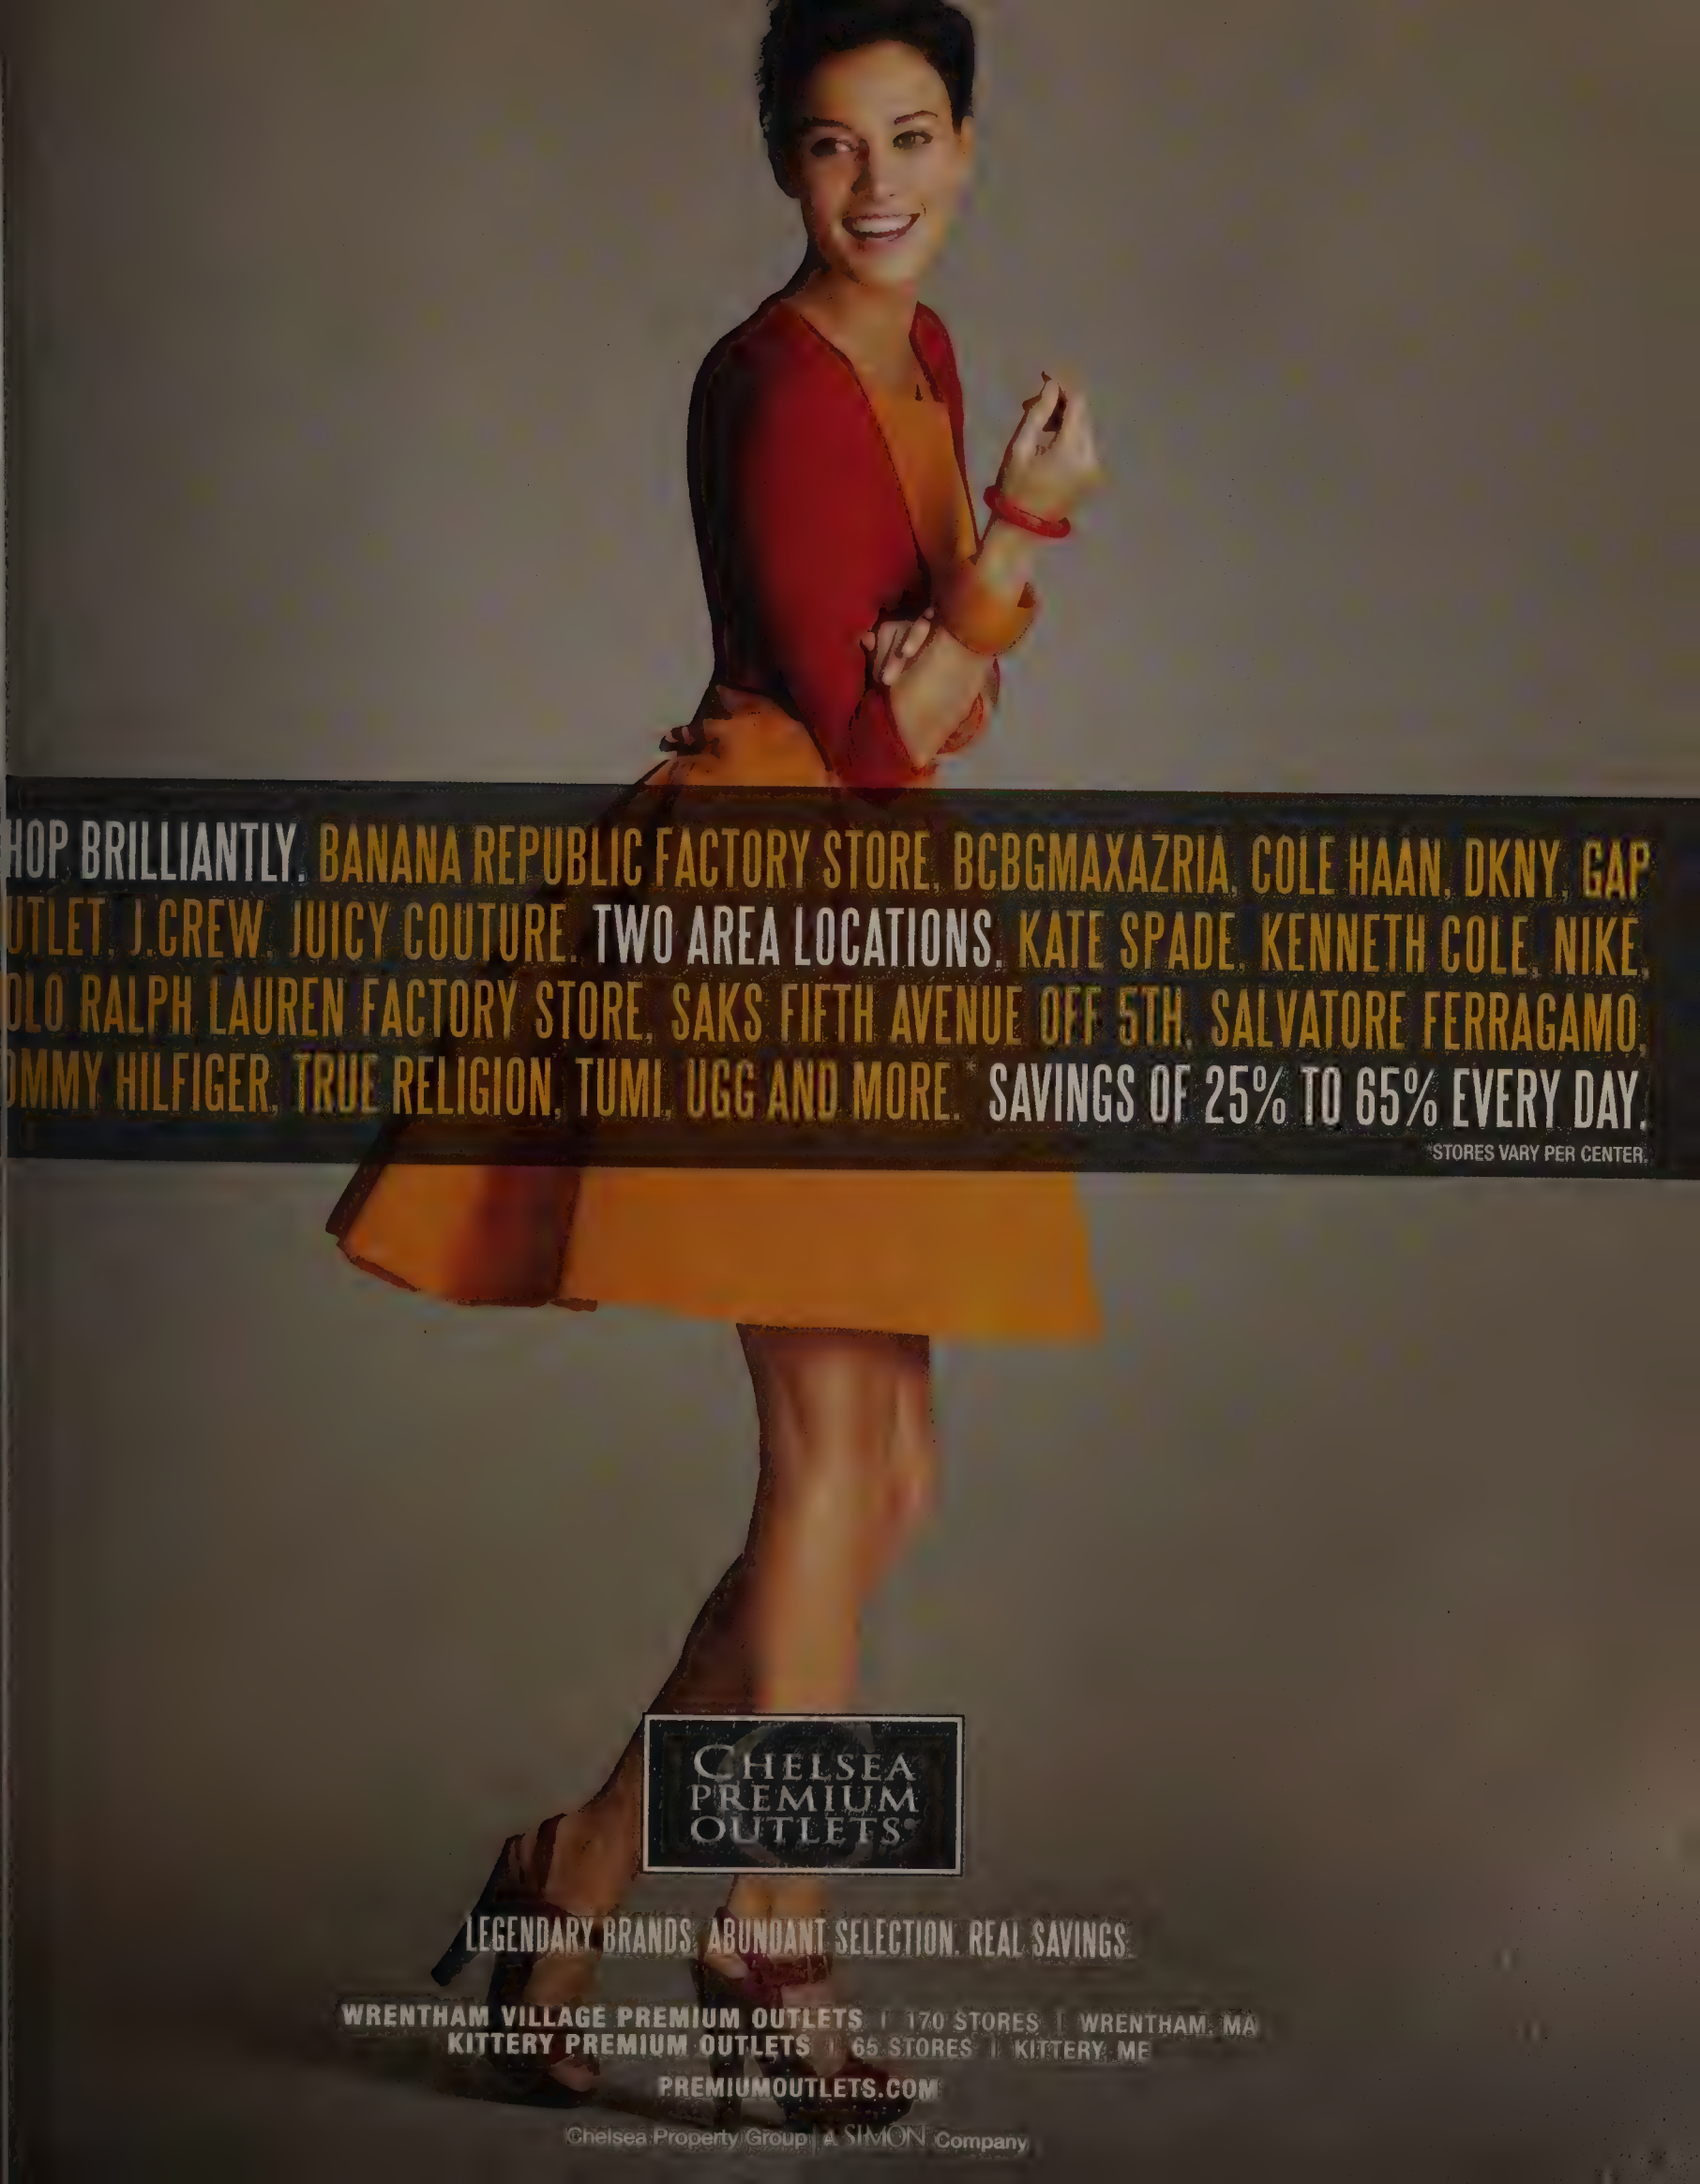
Keeping Up Appearances

My first beauty regimen began with a bottle of Johnson's No More Tangles. To tame my curls, my mom coated my hair in the stuff like a gardener spraying weeds. I've since graduated to grown-up products, but the routine remains largely the same. It gets about five minutes of my morning attention and always benefits from salon intervention.

Given the number of straighteners on the market, I'm not alone. When it comes to their appearances, plenty of people need expert help. Enter style guru and cover guy Clinton Kelly, costar on TLC's What Not to Wear. Kelly's the king of the once-over, applying a little tough love to fashion victims nationwide.



While he sticks to clothing, plastic surgeons use a heavier hand. Out of curiosity, Jonathan Soroff met with three local doctors to see how they'd change him. Despite recommendations for an eye tuck, laser spot removal and Botox, Soroff decided inner beauty beats thousands of dollars in medical bills. Self-esteem is priceless.

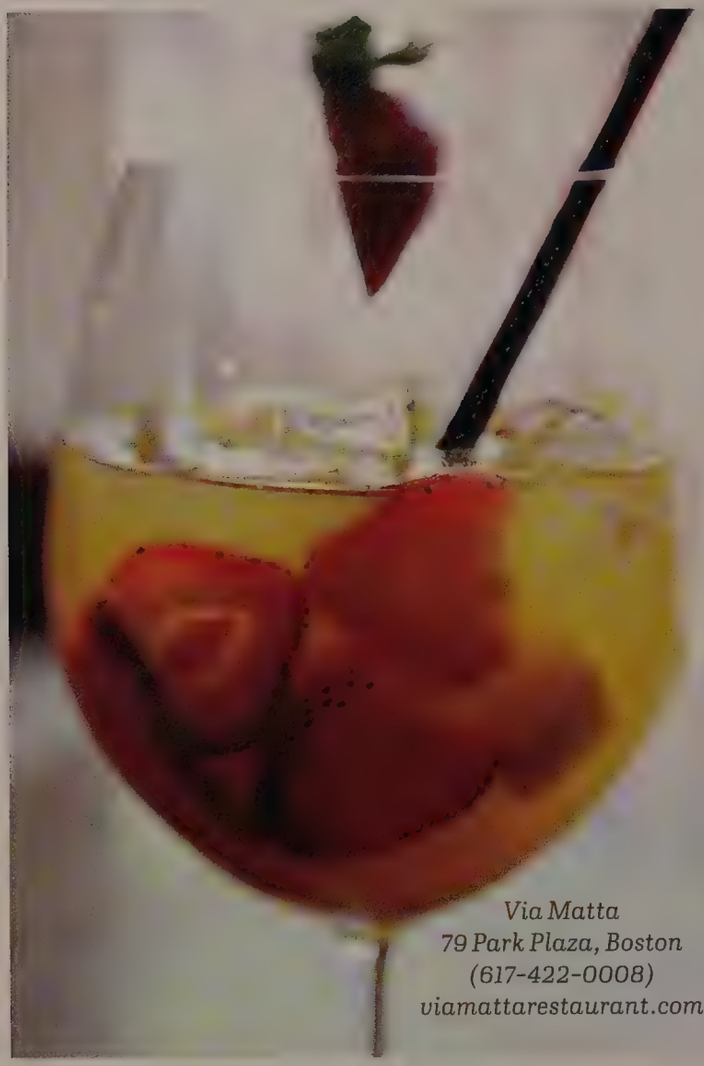
Too Much Is Never Enough: 10 More

TO THE MANNERS BORN

IT'S A COMMON ENOUGH SCENE at a family dinner. The kicking feet. The slack mouth, teeth gnashing wetly on a wad of chicken. The misused coffee spoon and the untouched napkin. And that's just the parents.

Etiquette, an art that some consider to be the most practicable path to inner beauty, has sunk far from its Victorian heyday. For many, a fish fork is as familiar as a scalping knife. Christine Curtis, founder of Etiquette Made Easy, is working to fix the deficiencies in our social graces.



"Etiquette is an important life skill," says Curtis, who started teaching manners and communication four years ago. "It helps a person become more comfortable in new settings and in everyday life. They become comfortable meeting people for the first time."

Curtis first took a professional interest in manners when she was studying for her master's in education. Parents, she saw, wanted professional guidance in showing their kids how to behave at, say, a wedding.

"People are surprised at how important eye contact is," she says. "And they're surprised that there are two styles of eating." Today she teaches private classes to everyone from toddlers to CEOs worried that their handshakes are unsound.

"Everyone comes to the class with a different background and different things they've been exposed to, but they learn how important etiquette is," Curtis explains. "Remember that when children grow up and get jobs, someone will be watching."

Drink of the Moment

A Pitcher's Worth 301 Words

Coworkers refer to her as the sangria sommelier. Before Amy Wendel's shift, her mom called to get her peach-strawberry recipe for a day at the beach. "I could not even tell you how much I love sangria," Wendel states. She doesn't really have to.

Wendel's affair with sangria began on a college trip to Barcelona, and as the Iberian Peninsula is the birthplace of sangria, the base wine is traditionally a native red like Rioja. But Wendel can't recall ever making a batch with red. Other bartenders, like the ones at Tapeo or Taberna de Haro, typically add touches of spirits like triple sec and brandy. Wendel doesn't care for brandy. "I always like to put vodka in my sangria," she blasphemes. "I'm not a fan of those sangrias where you have to drink three glasses before you feel something." Though she may have fallen for the original, Wendel's tastes veer toward the untraditional.

To make a batch of the stout, strawberry-mango sangria she now serves at Via Matta ($12 per glass), mix 1 ½ liters of grillo, 8 oz. of orange juice, 6 oz. each of Absolut Mango and triple sec, 4 oz. of simple syrup and both lime and lemon juices, and add sliced mango and strawberries. The resulting concoction is sweet, but fruit sweet. White-wine sweet. And though the vodka doesn't deliver a cutting blow to the sugar, it has a welcome impact on the cerebral cortex.

In Boston, sangrias are customarily seen solely in the summer, but that's another rule Wendel chooses to bend, as last summer's rosé with strawberries and a brachetto float was followed by winter's rosemary and pears with grillo. "I made a giant punch bowl of the pear for Thanksgiving," a passing fellow bartender says. "See?" Wendel asks. "Sangria can be for anything." NICK ALTSCHULLER

Sausage With a Side of Eggs

Last we left Peter Irving, he had just started making sausages in his small South Boston kitchen. Evidently, Irving's got a knack for working the meat grinder. In addition to the Italian-style links with peppers he and his wife, Natasha, serve at dinner, most dishes on their newly added brunch menu come with a pair of thick, house-made ginger-sage pork patties. That includes the French toast named after her dad (Boris, of course) and a classic rendition of fried eggs nestled inside sandwich bread. ELIZABETH BOMZE

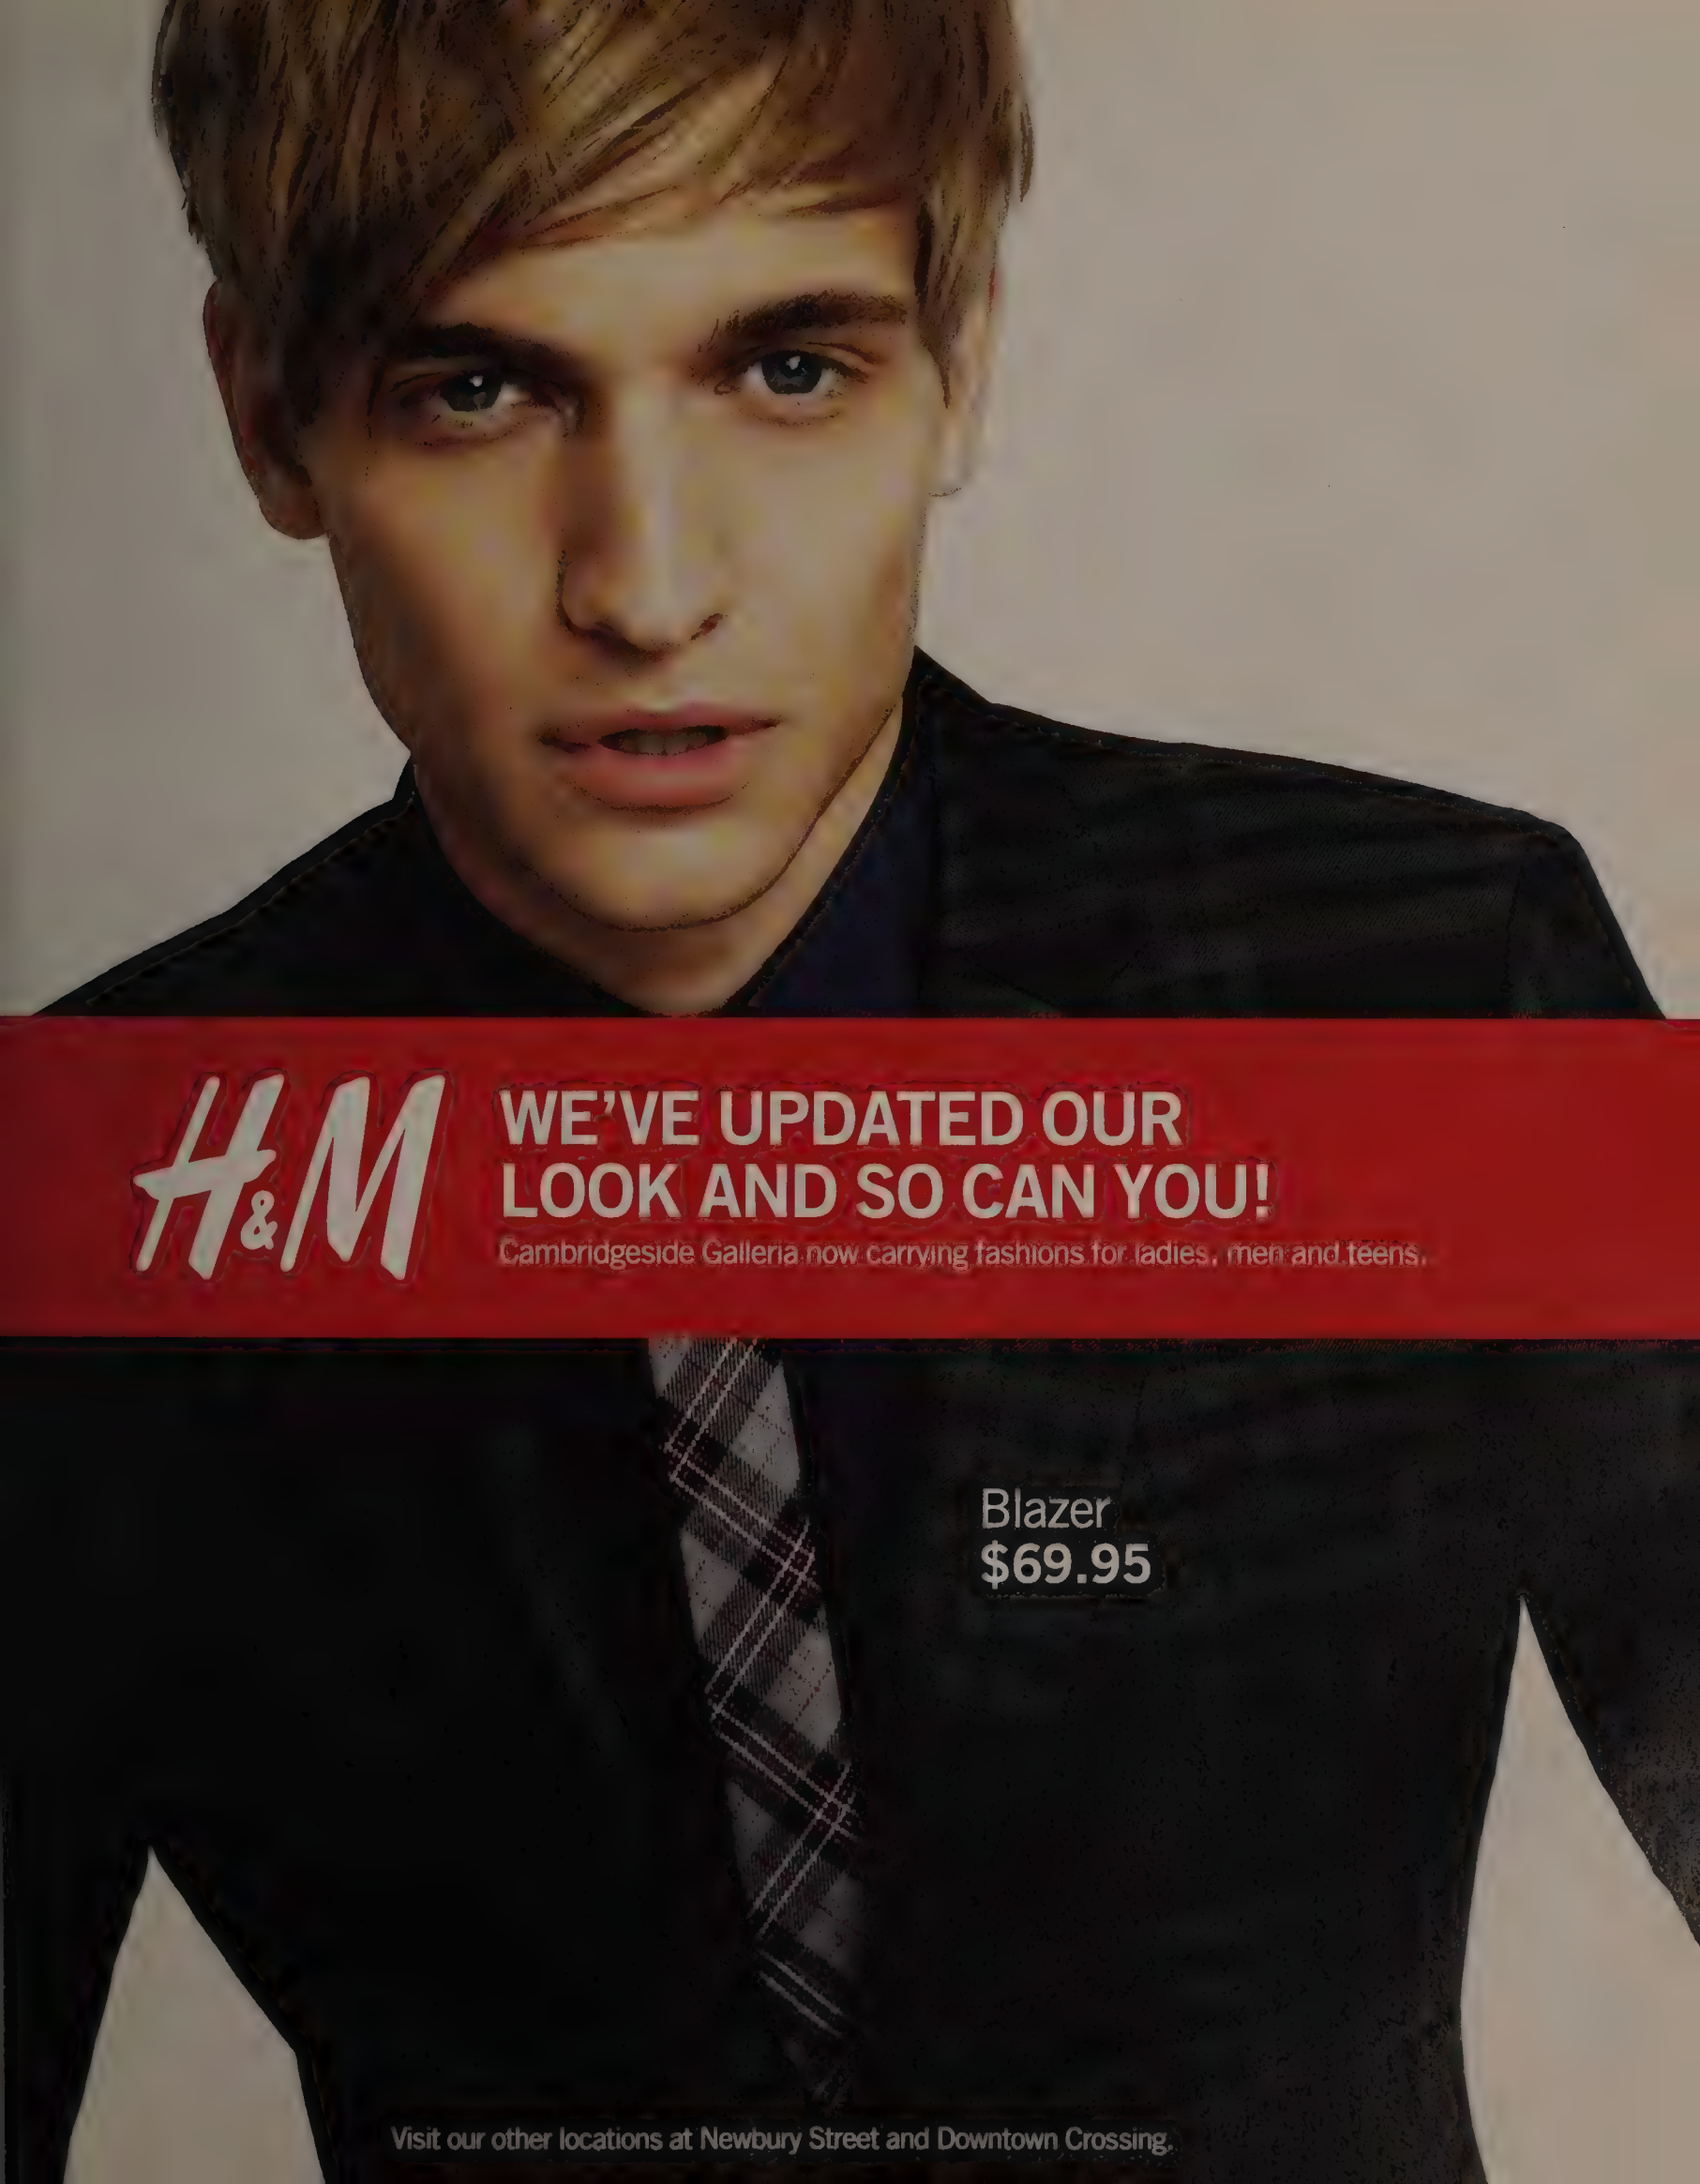
JODY COHEN PRESIDENT OF COSMOHOLIC COSMETICS

Easy Lip Scrub: Mix sugar and olive oil together. Using a toothbrush or finger, rub in little circular motions.

Caffeine Body Scrub: Mix coffee grounds with egg whites and apply. The caffeine is used to help energize the skin.

Mask for Acne-Prone Skin: Apply egg whites to your skin and let them set for about 15 minutes.



Mask for Dull Skin: Mix strawberries and plain yogurt and apply to your face.

Treatment for Eye Puffiness: Place sliced, cold cucumbers over your eyes for about 15 minutes.

Complexion Clearer: Drink lemon mixed with lukewarm water. It helps to improve your skin's appearance.

Cleanser: Combine cucumber juice and milk to make a natural cleanser.

LESS IS MORE

After a prelude to a summer that could be called intemperate but perhaps more accurately inauspicious, it's pleasing to amble into a sunlit, sidewalk restaurant and relax under a ceiling fan that slowly circulates the scent of mint wafting in from the kitchen. It's a relaxing position—and an unexpected place to find chef Bill Bradley. Following studies in the Napa Valley and the Piedmont region of Italy, Bradley moved to the Northeast to redesign the Wellesley Inn. From there it was the North End to open both Bricco and Carmen. Next came a string of gigs, including culinary director of Rustic Kitchen, and until Patrick Buben and Vina DePaolo—owners of Bacco and Tapeo—called, he was consulting for Church. Perhaps here at Pazzo, Bradley has found a spot to drop anchor.

The bright, sleek space offers 160 seats, including 40 outdoors, and serves cuisine that collides at the crossroads of Newbury and Hanover streets. For dainty nibblers, there's stuzzichini, or snacks, like grilled artichokes with lemon, mint and feta ($8), and carpaccios like waygu shoulder with Parmesan gelato ($12). They're exemplars of the clean, simple flavors seen throughout the menu, and the ones people often misattribute. "People say it's Cal-Italian. What does that mean, that I use avocado?" Bradley asks. "Californians have been cooking like Italians. It's not what you add; it's what you take away."

Bradley's Piedmont influence is seen in pastas like potato gnocchi ($17) and herbed ricotta gnudi ($18). California comes through with a liberal use of vegetables. Take the pesto-grilled salmon ($19) with a salad of radish, feta, onions, beans, asparagus and mint. Humorously, settled at the bottom of the menu like silt are "the Parms." "It's a nod to people who come and think of red-sauce Italian," Bradley concedes.

But the hope is to twist expectations. "Newbury Street needed a fresh approach to dining," Bradley states. "You have an opportunity here to eat well and not pay Newbury prices, which surprises a lot of people."

Wine

To Shell With It All

It's a rule of thumb that oysters go particularly well with crisp, unoaked white wines that have moderate alcohol and a liberal dash of acidity. One completes the flavor of the other, the wine refreshing your palate like a squeeze of lemon. The usual suspects (muscadet, Loire sauvignon blanc and Champagne) are all guaranteed winners, but other options will provide just as much excitement. Here are three oyster-friendly suggestions:

Sybille Kuntz Riesling "Trocken," Mosel, Germany, 2007 ($18, Busa Wine & Spirits, Lexington). Germany now produces over half of its total riesling in a drier style, although the wines with discernible sugar still dominate the American market. You can tell a riesling isn't sweet when it's labeled "Trocken." A longtime favorite, Kuntz exudes green herb, lime leaf and baked pear aromas, with a mouthful of appetizing crisp apple flavors. There's a hint of saltiness in the tart, juicy finish, with a long aftertaste. You can even screw the cap back, refrigerate and pour another glass the next day.

Maison Champy Bourgogne Aligoté Burgundy, France, 2007 ($18, Martignetti Liquors, Brighton). Rare and delicious, but not terribly pricey, aligoté (pronounced al-lay-go-TAY) is the other Burgundy white grape. Aged on the lees, it's considerably tangier than you'd expect from a chardonnay, with some sharp palate-tingling acid that's balanced by its creamy, vanilla-like essences. Fermented in stainless steel and then aged on the yeast, it's got lemony, freshly spicy flavors with a touch of mineral notes in the lingering finish.

Kuentz-Bas Riesling "Tradition," Alsace, France, 2005 ($16, Bauer Wine & Spirits, Boston). This is a bone-dry thriller. The aromas are honeyed, with fresh floral essences and a hint of earthiness. Flavors show a combination of stone-fruit peachiness, with ultra-racy, almost searing, lemony notes. This is consistently one of the best values around. It has a crystalline purity and an extra kick of savoriness that stands up to cocktail sauces and accompaniments of all kinds, including horseradish.

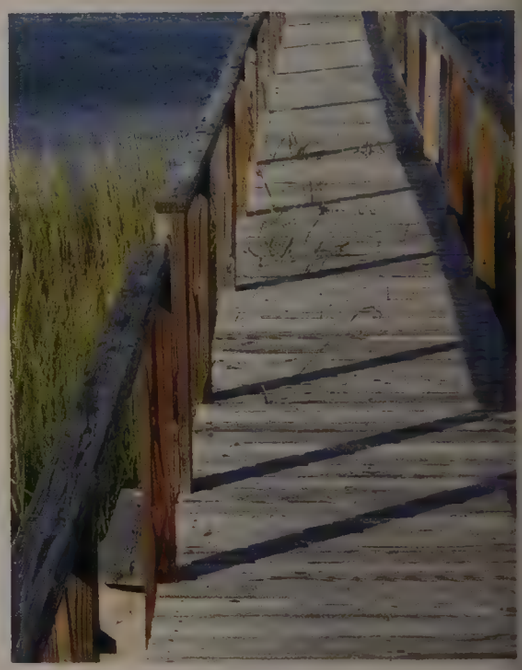
ROUGH WATERS

A drowning uncovers secrets among friends.



THE FOUR COUPLES in Elin Hilderbrand's novel bond over sumptuous meals of pasta, Cristal and chardonnay. They're cozy, loving and conspiratorial in their privileged existence.

But things change when one couple, Tess and Greg, drowns while sailing on an anniversary cruise from Nantucket to the Vineyard, leaving behind twins. What follows is an enticingly layered picture of the secret love affairs that had nestled inside their friendships all along. The mysterious drowning (Champagne, pills, a cell phone pocketed afterwards concealing... what?) thrusts the sizzle of guilt on the friends, making them privately suspect they contributed to the deaths. They're not entirely wrong. Addison, the richest member, had indeed been guilty of having an affair with Tess, and Greg, heart-throbby singer and teacher, had gotten involved with a student. Other friendships had various twists of hidden intimacy. Hilderbrand explores the group's pre-drowning past, lending poignancy, explanation and forgiveness, but also some real sting. Love messes things up, but loyalty conquers, almost, all. ✖✖✖

MISSED CONNECTION

TO THE YOUNG GENTLEMAN IN Boston Public Garden: As someone who usually gets royally irritated by obnoxious teeny-boppers and their egotistical ignorance, your act of kindness really melted my hardened heart. While walking through the Garden on a rare, beautiful summer day, I saw you drop a $20 bill into the case of a saxophonist without a second thought. Judging by your apparent high-school age, and the American Eagle attire you were sporting, I'm sure this was no small sum for you. Possibly a large chunk of your part-time job's paycheck. In a time of recession, people twice your age could take a cue from you and learn to give back to [others] every once in a while. And additional kudos to you for acknowledging the fine art of jazz.

Anonymous Garden pedestrian

To the wonderfully persistent bankteller on Boylston Street:

I appreciate your concern for my lack of a savings account and your repeated attempts (read: four attempts) to get me to open one up. How foolish I was when I replied that I barely made enough money to save and really had no need to balance two accounts, but you saw right through that and continued your quest to delve into my personal business and tell me all the magical things I could save for. Yes, I know it only takes a few minutes. Yes, I understand it is of no charge to me. And, yes, I get that your job sucks, and you have nothing better to do than to waste my time when all I want to do is deposit my paychecks and get to class. I apologize for my ignorance.

Could be saving for that house on a student's income

To the angry Dunkin' Donuts employee at the Back Bay T stop:

I just find it funny that most of the employees at this particular Dunkin' Donuts are fast, and they know how to keep you right on schedule, but this one employee takes it way too far. Excuse me, sir, who loves to comment on my colorful highlights, but if you swat your hand in my face and project saliva on my beautiful, dry-cleaned outfit one more time, I might have to squeeze the delicious lemon from my iced tea into your eye. Maybe if I complain to the manager, I'll get a free donut!

SCREENING THE FACTS

Sunscreen and I have a complicated relationship. While the gloppy stuff shields me from cancer, it causes my sensitive skin to break out. Personally, I don't want my epidermis looking like rawhide by age 30, and the thought of premature crow's feet makes me cringe, so like any respectable and informed individual, I apply my SPF. But as it begins to pop up in lip gloss and hair products and everything else under the sun, I can't help but wonder if there's such a thing as too much protection. Dr. Jafar Koupaie, president and staff physician at the Boston Dermatology and Cosmetic Surgery Center, assures me that we can all relax a little. "These companies are going crazy selling people lipstick and eye shadows with SPF and really we don't need any of those. This is all marketing for [them]," he says. "If you use moisturizer without SPF, that is still protective. Don't go lie down for six or seven hours in the sun, but for 15 to 20 minutes if you're walking in the sun, that's enough protection for you." See sidebar for more facts from Koupaie.

AMANDA KNORR

1 Sun is beneficial to your skin. The sun is good for you, and your body benefits from the Vitamin D.

2 SPF shouldn't be worn around the sensitive eye areas. SPF can really irritate sensitive areas of your face and can be harmful to your eyes. Your eyebrows, lashes and bone structure are intended to protect those areas. Wearing sunglasses is helpful, too.

3 Zinc oxide is as effective as SPF. Zinc oxide is great if you have sensitivities to SPF, and it is just as effective. It's available at any pharmacy.

4 Different skin tones require different levels of protection. Skin tones are based on a 1–6 scale. People with a level 1 skin tone need the most protection, while a level 6 needs very little.

5 Tanning beds are much worse for your skin than sun. Between the sun and your skin is a protective ozone layer, which tanning beds don't have. It's better to build a gradual tan outdoors, than it is in a tanning salon.

Yogurt Class

Frozen yogurt that actually tastes like yogurt? Fresh fruit that's actually fresh? Conceptually, this is a no-brainer, but it was only when the country kicked the TCBY craze and latched onto Pinkberry (and all the independent incarnations that followed) that fro-yo lost its reputation as a saccharine sweet. At boYo, a cheery, polka-dotted parlor on Beacon Hill, the challenge is to stand out. Three of their trademarks: funky toppings like mini mochi imported from the Bay Area, free Wi-Fi and an hour's worth of validated parking. ELIZABETH BOMZE

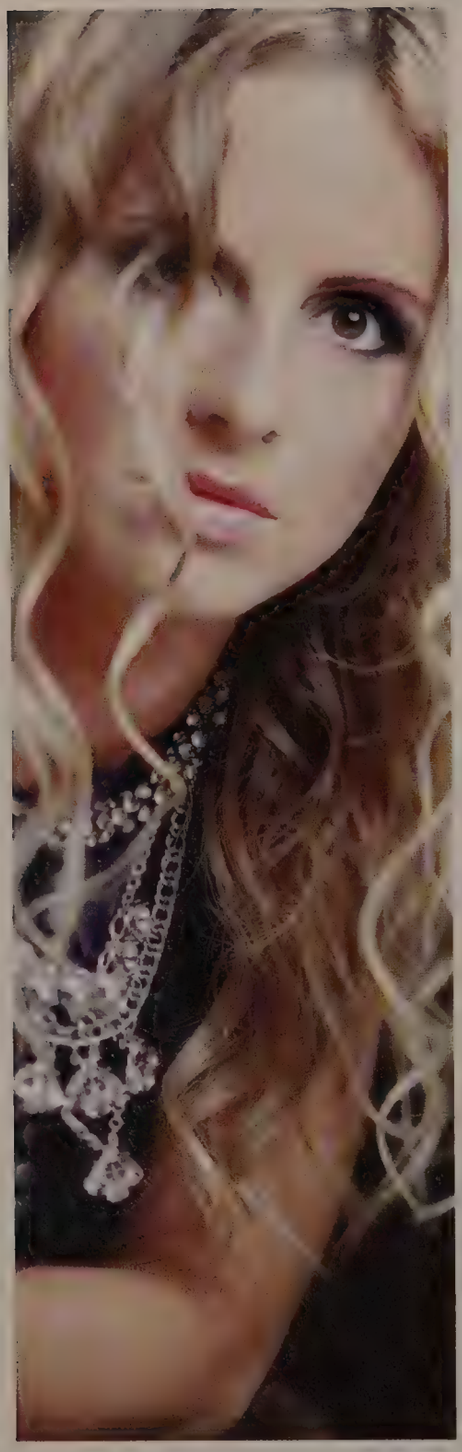
NOTHING FINER THAN A 24-HOUR DINER

South Street stays open.



THE STAKES WERE HIGH. Would Boston's only 24-7 eatery be forced by the city's licensing board to cut back its hours? Numbers predicted the outcome. On one side, the South Street Diner, supported by more than 1,000 petition signatures and the mayor of Boston, as well as by assorted customers who appreciate the 'round the clock service offered by the eatery since last April. On the other side, a few neighbors playing the role of buzz-kill, annoyed by the diner's late-night activity. According to owner Sol Sidell, they "want to blame our little business for their declining property values." The neighbors who wanted the diner to close at 2 am were no-shows at the City Hall hearing on July 7. And the winner is... well, let's just say your 3 am French toast is no longer in jeopardy.

MOST RENOVATIONS, HOWEVER MINOR, take longer than anticipated. And most people get cranky waiting in line. But Flour Bakery in the South End is exceptional for more than its baked goods. It reopened right on schedule, drawing its customary peaceful queue of customers, after several days of closure to install new flooring and ceilings, repaint walls and hang up large mirrors. Welcome back, apricot-almond cake muffins!

FIT FOR A KING

Tupelo brings great Cajun flavor back to Boston.

BRAISE BE UNTO THEE Daube of beef with hominy mashed potatoes makes a hearty entrée.

I FIRST VISITED NEW ORLEANS many years ago and immediately fell in love with the city's grace and charm, the rhythms of its music and even the slightly naughty elements of its nightlife. Yet since my gastronomic awakening, New Orleans' strongest draw has been the food. Over the last dozen or so years in Boston, a number of restaurants influenced by the Crescent City have come and gone: the Cajun Yankee, Dixie Kitchen, Zydeco Grille and Rouge.

Don't despair, gumbo gourmands and étouffée enthusiasts. The Cajuns and Creoles are back at Tupelo in Cambridge. A colorful mural evoking Diego Rivera runs along the interior soffit of this storefront eatery, and together with the copper-clad tables, provides a pleasant dose of ambiance to counter the plain-Jane, functional look. A ceiling fan or two rotates languorously in contrast with the energy and alertness of the servers.

To start, I devoured Tupelo's fried oysters ($8). Briny and succulent, the five plump bivalves boasted a light breading that provided a crusty counterpoint to their silky texture. Green tomatoes added a pleasant acidity. Shrimp and crab jambalaya ($7), spicy but not fiery, delivered a pungent gusto lacking in the rather boring shrimp remoulade ($8), with seasoning provided solely by mustardy cocktail sauce. But three hefty, moist turkey meatballs ($6) brought savory, well-herbed flavor in a broth worthy of mopping with a hunk of French bread.

Main courses began with a giant bowl of gumbo ($9) that transported me to the French Quarter. This toothsome combination of okra, peppers, celery, onions, garlic and filé (an aromatic thickening agent consisting of ground sassafras leaves) was chock-full of superb andouille sausage, slivers of dark and light chicken meat, and rice, a hearty meal for a cool spring evening. I seldom repeat a dish in this burdensome job of research, but I made an exception with Tupelo's gumbo, one of the best I've ever tasted.

The other mains didn't disappoint. A barbecued half chicken ($14), lusciously flavored with a bourbon-maple barbecue sauce, came with cheddar grits, sweet purple onions and a refreshing salad of dressed greens. Hominy mashed potatoes and tasty collards gave strong support to the daube of beef ($15), a traditional French preparation for a hearty braised beef, tender and aromatic from a felicitous combination of herbs and spices.

The thick and moist roasted pork chop ($14) includes a side of red beans and rice, which, along with Tupelo's other first-rate garnishes ($5), epitomized down-home, N'awlins cookery. The beer-battered crepes ($12), perhaps a dish that followed the Acadians from Nova Scotia on their path to become Louisiana's Cajuns, survived the migration in fine form. Slightly sweet while still savory, they resembled a spinach-and-cheese cannelloni garnished with tomato sauce and fennel. Only the fried catfish ($14.50) disappointed, the already challenged texture further degraded by a platform of mashed potatoes.

Charles' Picks

Fried oysters

Daube of beef

Stone-fruit crisp

Huge portions did not deter us from diving into the desserts (all $7), which included a marvelous brown-butter pecan pie with blackberry sauce and Tupelo honey ice cream, and a refreshing stone-fruit crisp with peaches, nectarines, plums and a well-constructed almond crust. Less successful was the double-chocolate bread pudding, which I found dry and virtually bereft of the promised Bourbon cream sauce, while the coconut cream pie was too sweet, an issue exacerbated by the addition of peanut butter candy. For beverages, Tupelo offered a select but diverse range of wines by the glass. Beers included a pleasantly bitter IPA ($4.75) and smooth amber ($4.50) brewed by the Abita Brewing Company, just north of New Orleans. On the other hand, we found a pitcher of watermelon sangria ($24) nearly flavorless and laughably steep, especially in comparison to the value seen throughout the rest of the menu.

Overall, Tupelo serves excellent, creatively conceived food at reasonable prices. And the attentive, good-natured staff creates a comfortable atmosphere despite the tiny, often crowded dining room. As the Michelin Guide would put it, this place is clearly worth a detour. ×××

CAN'T STOP

Don't you go forgetting about Michael Jackson already.

I KNOW IT'S BEEN a few weeks now, so you're probably over the whole Michael Jackson thing. Well, I'm not. Because Michael Jackson was the most important person ever. That's not hyperbole; that's fact. Some people say that all the commotion over his death was due to an unusual alchemy of fame, controversy and an untimely demise. You might be sick of hearing about him or think this whole thing has been blown way out of proportion. I think that's nonsense. There could be no bigger deal than the death of a musician who hasn't had a hit in two decades. North Korea can just chill out with the nuclear missiles, because we have bigger fish to fry. We have to keep talking about Michael Jackson, because the second we stop doing so, we start paying attention to other people and things that are happening. And that's just wrong.

Michael Jackson was an icon for black people. And later, for white people. He sang, "It doesn't matter if you're black or white." And really, he would know.

Michael Jackson was a dance genius. Before Jackson, the moonwalk was done only by astronauts, and it was a very bouncy dance that required a bulky spacesuit and access to rocket ships. But he said, "To heck with that. I'm going to reinvent the moonwalk as something that can be done badly by anyone at a wedding."

Michael Jackson was a poet. His song "Got the Hots" speaks to the human condition in a language that only he knew. It begins, "Uh, hee, hee. Uuh, hoo, hoo, hee. Uh, hoo, hoo, hee, uh." When I face hardship in my life, it's words like these that lift me up and inspire me to persevere, to stand tall and hoo hee, uh.

Michael Jackson challenged the arbitrary strictures of society. Before him, convention said that you had to wear two gloves, even if only one hand was cold. People said, "Zombies don't dance. Dancing zombies would be silly." People said that children shouldn't be named after inanimate objects, but now Apple Martin would beg to differ. And when I have children, I'm sure that Duvet and Nightstand will thank the King of Pop for making their names socially acceptable.

Since Michael Jackson's death, he's been compared to Elvis and John Lennon. I think that's a joke. Because Jackson wasn't like those guys; he was what would happen if Elvis and John Lennon had a baby with Jim Morrison and Stevie Wonder, and then that baby had a baby with James Brown and Frank Sinatra's baby. When you concentrate that much talent in one person, you'd think it would make them insane. But not Jackson. He kept an even keel right to the end, waking up in the morning and putting on his crested cape, one solid-gold button at a time, just like any other average Joe.

He inspired others. Without "Beat It," we wouldn't have Weird Al Yankovic's "Eat It." Without "Bad," Weird Al would've never recorded "Fat," the biggest hit on the album Even Worse. Tribute band Who's Bad would have no songs to sing. The guy on the Internet selling a poster of Jackson with a llama—$559.99, if you're interested—would have nothing to sell.

Neither would the guy offering "Uncle Tookie the Frog." This is described as a "very rare cuddly toy from the sought-after Michael Jackson Pets collection, based on pets Jackson actually owned in the early 1980s." I mean, haven't we all owned a frog named Uncle Tookie at some point in our lives? It's amazing that someone with such an extraordinary upbringing was so like us in so many ways.

I'll admit that it's been a while since Jackson topped the charts. When Sony released a greatest hits album in 2003 (Number Ones), the most recent songs were from the 1991 album Dangerous. And you know what replaced Dangerous in the top spot on the Billboard 200? Nirvana's Nevermind. Perhaps the King of Pop was dethroned by grunge. But look who's laughing now. Not grunge bands, because they like to mope around drinking coffee. At least, they did back in 1991.

Of course, there's an elephant in the room. I think you know what I'm talking about. Everyone has an opinion on this, but I've made up my mind on the subject. The bottom line is, Jackson never actually tried to buy the deformed skeleton of the Elephant Man. That was just a story he floated to the tabloids as a gag. Seriously. The ol' "I'm trying to buy the Elephant Man's skeleton" joke—classic Jackson.

One thing we can all agree on: This is the defining pop-music death of our generation. Unless Madonna dies. ✖✖✖

PORN TO BE WILD

Experiences in voyeurism

THERE'S A WONDERFUL tune sung by a puppet monster in the musical Avenue Q called "The Internet Is for Porn." It convinces you as much. I've heard several stories from friends and acquaintances about people bagged by spouses and families for excessive use of adult images online. We all know it's a multibillion-dollar obsession.

As a freshman in college, I was home for Christmas vacation when my friend Alan, on break from a different school, called. "I brought home a few skin flicks," he said. "The fraternity house had 'em. One supposedly has Yma Sumac, the Peruvian singer." Who could resist watching the woman who could hit C above high C? Imagine what else she could do. "My mother's out shopping," I said. "Bring 'em over."

"You got a projector?

"Good point," I said. "Gail's got a projector… I'll call her now." Gail was my girlfriend. "I'll bring the projector," she offered. "But don't expect me to watch disgusting stuff."

"I would never…" I started to say.

"This will cost you," she answered.

Gail lugged over the projector, and I carried it into the cellar. This consisted of an unfinished basement with lots of shelves containing every Life magazine for the last 15 years. After setting up the projector on a table, she glanced at the hanging sheet. "Great screen you've got," Gail said. "Have a ball." She went upstairs, probably to check my bureau drawers.

Grainy, shaky images paraded across a wrinkled sheet and, although they somewhat amazed Alan and me, we both felt more embarrassed than anything else. I was frightened that Gail would tell her parents. Or that my mother would sneak into the basement and tell my father, who would sentence me to the Chateau D'If like the Count of Monte Cristo.

Porn eluded me for some time after that. In the middle of the 1970s, I got involved in a book project with a screenwriter responsible for two of the era's most famous movies. He lived outside of Boston but came to town for private screenings. He'd ask to see anything he pleased, and the theater owner complied. He invited my wife and me to join him, his wife and another couple for a comedy and then dinner at Athens Olympia. As the six of us settled into the screening room, the projectionist yelled down, "I've got a copy of Deep Throat. Wanna see it?"

"Let 'er rip," called out our host.

Five minutes into the movie, the screenwriter's wife stood up and yelled, "Stop it! Cut!" And the lights came on.

"Didn't even get to the good parts," the other male guest said.

"Well," my wife added, "at least there'll be Greek salad and lamb for dinner."

The male star of the movie, using the film name "Harry Reems," surfaced in my life a year later. He was sued by the attorney general of Tennessee for his involvement in pornography. A producer-friend in Hollywood called and asked if I'd see the infamous Reems to perhaps help raise money for his defense. "Free speech is everything," the producer said. "We've got to pitch in for our rights." Right.

Reems came into my office, looking like someone who could appear on Saturday Night Live. He was both amusing and scared. "Most actors starve, most of the time," he said. "So the chance came to make a little money, who cares? I can get into any role. Do you know how tough it is to perform with klieg lights and 20 people watching you? Don Juan probably couldn't get erect."

He paused and sadly said, "So, what about raising some money?" Several dozen people stood outside my office, gawking. Reems looked at them and shook his head. "I want to do Shakespeare," he said. "Can you believe it?"

My favorite porn story is more recent. I saw an old friend last week, Ed White, one of the smartest mutual-fund managers in Boston. He told me, "Years ago, in the Navy, I was the entertainment officer. One of my duties was to provide the ship with movies. My counterpart on a neighboring destroyer called me and said, 'I've got one of the most erotic flicks ever, unbelievable. Rin Tin Tin Gets In, it's called. We'll trade it for all your James Bond movies and all your comedies.'

'Well,' I said, 'our guys have been to sea for a long time. It's a deal.'

"So," Ed continued, "we traded. All the officers crowded the wardroom, and we turned on the film. Shot of a beautiful brunette in a cabin in the woods. Shot of a big German shepherd high on a wooded hill. The dog lopes down the hill toward the cabin. The brunette takes off her clothes. We see the shepherd scratching at the cabin door. The nude woman lets Rin Tin Tin in. The movie ends." Ed shook his head. "We got taken. A huge shaggy dog story. And we lost all of our James Bonds."

Sometimes in life, a long cold shower is the best remedy. ✖✖✖

ON DICE-K, CLAY, SHEED AND BRADY

5 OVER/UNDERS FOR SOX FINAL 60

As of Aug. 1, the Sox will have exactly 60 games left. All bets are now open.

Dice-K Starts
Over/Under .5
Have we seen the last of Matsuzaka in 2009? Our Magic Dice-K 8-Ball says... it says... it says... aw, screw it, this thing's way too slow. The Sox haven't given any indication that Dice-K will be back, and honestly, we don't blame them. The heart of a pennant race is no time to take his fragile psyche for a test drive. Bet: Under

Clay Buchholz Wins
Over/Under 4.5
Buchholz was stellar in his debut but came out in round two looking shakier than Muhammad Ali. So, grasshopper, how's it gonna be? We're optimistic that if Buchholz can get 10 more starts, he'll win at least five. Especially when the alternative includes a bus ride back to Little Rhody. Bet: Over

Mike Lowell Games Played
Over/Under 40
As far as athletes go, Lowell is as tough as they come. The guy could have a bobcat gnawing on his torso and still demand a spot in the lineup. But after watching him labor through the '08 playoffs, the Sox will only put Lowell out there if he's healthy. And in this case, that "if" is bigger than Rich Garces' ass. Bet: Under

Dustin Pedroia Batting Average
Over/Under .320
With a .301 average and a team-leading 110 hits (at press time), you'd be insane to suggest that 2009's been an off year for Pedroia. But by his standards, hasn't it felt just a little, ahem, unassuming? Still, Pedey always does his best work late, so piss off if you think we'll be the ones who bet against him. Bet: Over

Wins Over the Yankees
Over/Under 6.5
Seven out of 10? No problem. Unless the Yankees are smart and trot out 10 different rookie pitchers. That's the best way to beat the Sox these days. Bet: Over

2 DOOMED REALITY SHOWS

T.O. PULLED IT OFF, BUT THESE GUYS WOULDN'T HAVE A SHOT...

Wake's World "Tonight, Tim and John Smoltz make plans to hit the town! That is, until they both pass out on the couch before 9 pm. Can you say plot twist?! Tune in next week, as the boys invite JD Drew over to watch a new episode of Hero Ships on the History Channel!"

Hard Knocks: New England Patriots HBO producer: "Hey coach! Great practice! Think we can finally get those cameras rolling tomorrow?" "Nah, probably not." "OK, OK. Big team meeting tonight, huh? Mind if we stop by?" "Yeah, I actually do." "OK, no prob, no prob. So, see you tomorrow then?" "Hmmm, I'd rather not..."

3 DATES TO WATCH

7/31 It's the MLB trade deadline, but the Sox have already made their most significant trade of the season. They exiled Julio Lugo! Nothing short of the return of Eric Gagne could rain on that Duck Boat parade.

8/3 Happy 32nd birthday, Tom Brady! Gisele's been mum on celebration plans, but she's hinted that she'll consider letting Tom give her a pedicure.

8/6 Tonight in New York, the Yanks will attempt to top the Sox for the first time since Sept. 28, a game immortalized by this leaked Johnny Damon diary entry: "Septrember 28, 2008—We beated Boston toonite! Go Yankys!!"

1 ONE NOTE FOR THE BACK OF YOUR MIND

Over the season's final weekend, the Rays and Yanks face off in a grueling three-game series in Tampa. The Sox? They'll be at home against last place Cleveland. Advantage, Boston. (Unless the Indians at some point discover that their owner is tanking the season so she can relocate to Miami.)

4 Ways Rasheed Makes the C's Better

He Extends the D When Sheed's in the game, Boston will have at least three long-range threats on the floor, and that means more room for Rajon Rondo. With more space to work, No. 9 is unstoppable. With more time to work? Eh, he'll spend it listening to music in his car.

He Stabilizes the Bench The two biggest voids in 2009 were those left by James Posey and PJ Brown. Wallace, he of ominous post presence and championship pedigree, fills a little bit of both. That's why, with apologies to Tony Allen, Sheed's our clear-cut favorite for Sixth Man of the Year.

He's Revitalized the Big 3 Can you remember the last time you saw the Big 3 this eager to get back on the court? We do. It was August '07. How'd that one turn out?

He's a Motivator Nothing against Paul Pierce or Ray Allen, but neither is the most emotional on-court leader. When KG went down, the Celtics suffered for it. Wallace has the unique ability to inspire his teammates regardless of the situation. Even if most of the time that's because they're scared of what he might do.

THIS SUMMER, THEO EPSTEIN AND PETER GAMMONS WILL PRESENT A HOT STOVE COOL MUSIC VIP PARTY BEFORE THE COUNTING CROWS TAKE THE STAGE ON MONDAY, AUGUST 31 AT THE BANK OF AMERICA PAVILION IN SOUTH BOSTON. THE PARTY WILL FEATURE A PERFORMANCE BY PETER GAMMONS AND THE HOT STOVE ALL-STARS FEATURING BILL JANOVITZ FROM BUFFALO TOM AND KAY HANLEY FROM LETTERS TO CLEO. ACTOR AND COMEDIAN MIKE O'MALLEY WILL BE THE EMCEE.

Soroff On ELAN SASSOON

The salon scion talks about his new ventures in styling and why short isn't sexy.

THE SON OF HAIR MAGNATE VIDAL, Elan Sassoon, 39, was born and raised in Beverly Hills and moved to Boston last year to build a "Harvard of hair" and to open the Mizu salon at the Mandarin Oriental. After a stint in the film business, Sassoon entered the beauty industry as co-owner of International Cosmetic Marketing, a company that launched the "Beverly Sassoon Vita Organics Skin Care" line for Target and made $7 million in sales during its first year. Prior to Mizu, he partnered on a regional spa venture, Green Tangerine—a chain of high-end, full-service spas located throughout New England. He also worked for Louis Vuitton and for Klinger Advanced Aesthetics. He's active with the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute and AME Amoroso, a Brazilian charity. Sassoon lives with his wife, Adriana, and their children in Chestnut Hill.

Jonathan Soroff: Why do something that your father was so famous for?
Elan Sassoon: I grew up in the business, and I realized that this is something that I love, so I came back to it.

Are you a stylist?
No. I could cut your hair, but no.

Ever have a bowl cut growing up?
No. My Dad always gave me really nice haircuts.

They say we're hardwired to find symmetry in a face attractive.
I can look at a woman's face, and if a certain arch in the eyebrow lines up with the tip of the nose, and the angle of the cheekbones… these are things that make the human eye respond.

Plastic surgery: pro or con?
Depends what age you are. I personally don't like it much. I like natural breasts. A natural body. So I'd say con. But if you're 60-something, and you want a little facelift to look better, sure.

Your wife is Brazilian. What's your opinion of the Brazilian wax?
It's fantastic. It's a must. [Laughs.]

Advice for guys with thinning hair?
Today's technology is pretty amazing. The transplants they do look so natural. I know that contradicts what I said before about plastic surgery, but if a guy is uncomfortable with thinning hair, there's a solution.

And if they're already going bald?
Shave it all off, make sure there's nothing on the sides and tan it. Get that nice Bruce Willis look. I think it's a great look.

Do you cut your own hair?
Sometimes, but not often.

What's your biggest beauty secret?
If I'm in the shower and conditioning my hair, I always brush it in. It seems to make it penetrate better. And before I go to bed, I definitely put the cream on the face.

Biggest mistake Boston women make with respect to their appearances?
You'll get me in trouble with a question like that. I'd like to see more women in nice jeans with sexy boots. That kinda works for me.

Thing you look for in a haircut?
I'm a big advocate of long, flowing hair. I don't like to see haircuts too short.

So your dad's famous bob doesn't do it for you?
Well, it was a sign of the times.

Put you through school.
Darn right. And a whole lot more. But I like long Brazilian hair.

How do you define a "maaahvelous cut," as your dad used to say?
I think the way the hair falls on the bone structure of the face. How it lies in relation to the cheekbones. Hair is an organic art form, always moving, always changing, and it serves as a frame for the face.

Ever resent having such a famous father?
When I was younger, other kids would sometimes make wisecracks, and I would end up getting into a lot of fights. The funny part was that they'd say things like, "Ooh-la-la, Sassoon," which was the designer jean brand, so it wasn't even about him. But no. I love the guy. He's amazing.

You plan to open the "Harvard of hair." What will its Latin motto be?
[Laughs.] I can tell you in English: "The bigger the hair, the greater the person." Just kidding.

So what should I do with my hair?
The crazy spikiness? That's your trademark look. It works for you. I would leave it. I don't think I'd recognize you otherwise.

Ultimately, how important are looks?
Your appearance is your initial presentation to the world. Later on, people might find out that someone has an amazing heart, soul, mind, everything, but your looks are your calling card. I think it's very important.

Are you a slave to fashion?
I like to wear nice clothes. I do my shopping. It's part of the package.

Single biggest thing the average Bostonian could do to look better?
Again, let [the] hair grow a little longer. Everybody's got really short hair in this city.

That's funny, since you make money off of cutting it.
I know, but you can still maintain that length and you look a little more relaxed, a little less conservative. It's sexier.

So why choose Boston for your school?
The people here are wonderful. And the school market was wide open. There's nothing here, or anywhere, of the caliber of what we're building.

Waxing or shaving?
For women? Waxing. For men? Depends what they're waxing.

Crack, back 'n' sack.
Shaving. Waxing hurts too much.

Since hair keeps growing after a person dies, how might you look if I dug you up a few years after you'd been in the ground?
One of those little troll dolls with hair down to their feet. Either that, or a member of ZZ Top. ✖✖✖

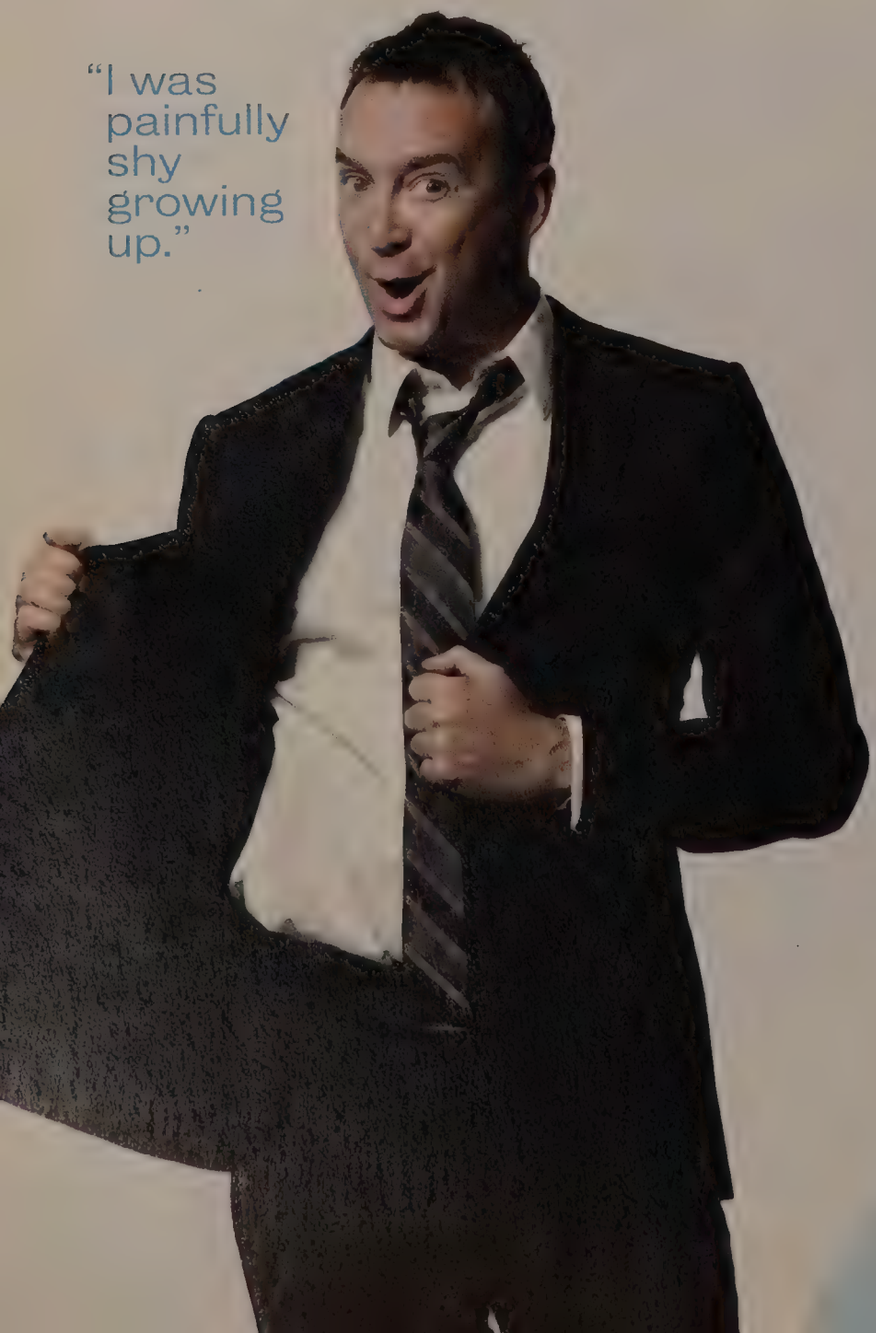
STYLE GURU CLINTON KELLY MAKES OVER AMERICA, ONE HIDEOUS OUTFIT AT A TIME.



BY AMANDA KNORR PHOTOGRAPHS BY JÖRG MEYER

WHEN STYLE EXPERT CLINTON KELLY ARRIVES AT OUR COVER SHOOT HE'S 85 PERCENT CAMERA-READY, AN IMPRESSIVE FEAT AT 8 AM. FOR A GUY WHO DRANK SHOTS IN THE NORTH END WITH SOME ENTHUSIASTIC FANS THE NIGHT BEFORE, KELLY LOOKS NEAR IMPECCABLE, HIS HAIR SLIGHTLY ASKEW FROM THE PERFECTION CAPTURED ON TV. HE QUICKLY SWITCHES OUT HIS DARK JEANS AND PAISLEY TOP FOR A PIN-STRIPED SUIT, SIPS SOME COFFEE, AND SUDDENLY HE'S ON, POSING, GOOFING AROUND AND GIVING HIS SIGNATURE SMIRK—THE ONE THAT SAYS, "POOR THING, YOU'RE IN DESPERATE NEED OF MY HELP." BETWEEN PHOTOS, HE SNEAKS A PEEK AT THE FILM. "ON THE INSIDE, I FEEL LIKE SUCH A GAWKY TEENAGER, SO IT'S WEIRD TO SEE SUCH A MANLY PICTURE!" HE CONFIDES. KELLY HAD HIS FAIR SHARE OF FASHION FAILURES GROWING UP ON LONG ISLAND AND AS A STUDENT AT BOSTON COLLEGE. NOW 40, HE HAS ONE GOAL: TO ATTAIN COMPLETE FABULOUSNESS (AND TO HELP AS MANY CLUELESS AMERICANS AS POSSIBLE IN THE PROCESS).

Kelly's well on his way with his seventh season of TLC's What Not to Wear (WNTW) in production and two books in print: Dress Your Best: The Complete Guide to Finding the Style That's Right for Your Body with costar Stacy London and Freakin' Fabulous: How to Dress, Speak, Behave, Eat, Drink, Entertain, Decorate, and Generally Be Better Than Everyone Else. The latter serves as the basis for a new TLC pilot. Still, it's rare to hear "Clinton" without "Stacy," an association and friend he adores. But lately he's branching out like a determined Olsen. This year alone, he'll shoot said pilot Freakin' Fabulous, begin his third book, and continue to travel cross-country for his Macy's & Clinton Kelly Make Over America tour.

This currently has him at the Burlington Mall, where a group of women in elasticized pants and scrunchies await his attention and expertise. They know he'll deliver both—proudly and unapologetically.

Oddly, the man who's famed for his outgoing and opinionated personality wasn't always a cynosure. "I barely spoke out in class," he recalls. "I was painfully shy growing up. I didn't leave my mother's leg until puberty. In high school, when I was a complete dork and not popular at all, I got through thinking, 'These people have no idea how fabulous I am!'" At BC, a creative writing course sparked his passion for journalism. "I never had any intention of entering the fashion industry. My philosophy has always been: Study the things that interest [you] the most, and a career will come from there." What followed was a master's degree at Northwestern and editor positions at Marie Claire, Mademoiselle and DNR magazines. He then landed a stint at WNTW through a casting agent. "I probably should've known when my father had to install extra shelves in my dorm for my sweaters that I was destined for fashion."

"I was painfully shy growing up."

Back at the Burlington Mall, Kelly mentally prepares to tackle 15 different women's physique and style hurdles by taking them shopping. "It's difficult to dress 15 women in a day when they don't have perfect bodies," he admits. "You can dress 15 models in three hours." Luckily for the non-Giseles, he prefers a challenge.

One Macy's contestant, 34-year-old Joy Greenwald from Framingham, recently lost 86 pounds through diet and exercise—and has no idea how to dress her new body. A longtime fan of WNTW, Greenwald's eager to show Kelly her transformation flipbook. "The first picture he said, 'That's not you! No, that's absolutely not you! You've lost an entire Joy!'" she recalls. "He's exactly like he is on TV. He was totally easy to be around and to talk to. I'm glad I [showed him photos] because I could never verbalize how much the show had influenced my life without taking him step by step through the changes."

WNTW series producer Evan Lerner is wowed by Kelly's ability to get to the heart of the issue. "Clinton really has a tap into the psychology behind dressing," Lerner explains. "He can laser point the kind of problem going on in someone's life that's being reflected in their wardrobe. And that's something amazing."

The other 14 women arrive—representing sizes from 4P to 18W, heights from 5'0" to 5'8" and issues from tapered jeans to low-hanging "girls." In a matter of minutes he has the whole room laughing with his eye rolls and disapproving looks. The ladies squirm, but seem ecstatic to be in his presence and eager to hear his famous one-liners, even at their own expense. For Kelly, it's all about the tough love.

"He's one of the funniest people I know," Lerner admits. "When we watch the monitor and [Clinton and Stacy] are at work, we're in stitches. Ninety-eight percent of the show is the two of them ad-libbing. He's a writer when it comes down to it, and I think that definitely comes across. He knows how to make a great moment."

For the Macy's participants, it's the ideal way to meet the man they watch every Friday night—no ambush, no secret footage and no public humiliation in the form of a 360-degree mirror. In fact, no video cameras whatsoever, until the next day, when the women get to strut their new-and-improved stuff down a runway in front of their friends, families and fellow fans. "After all that hard work, the end result erases the stress," Kelly says. "When you get to see all 15 of them shine and receive applause, it's such a positive-energy thing. There's this illumination that takes place. These women will leave feeling really great about themselves."

Of the 1,000 people who applied in the Boston area and 27,000 in the country so far (the tour continues this fall), Kelly hand-selects the final participants. It's not just muffin tops he's looking for. "I'm a sucker for a good story," he explains. "When women tell me they haven't been on a date in seven years—or a girl in Austin, Texas, said she was teased for being a nerd in high school—I'm choosing you!"

While all shapes and sizes make it on air, one bias sticks out like visible panty lines: no men. "We found out in our third season that the men's episodes weren't rating as highly as the women's episodes," he says. "I was a little disappointed about that, because I think the men on the show were having as much a life-changing experience as the women were." Off the show, Kelly snagged himself a pretty dapper man of his own, whom he'll marry this month at their Connecticut home.

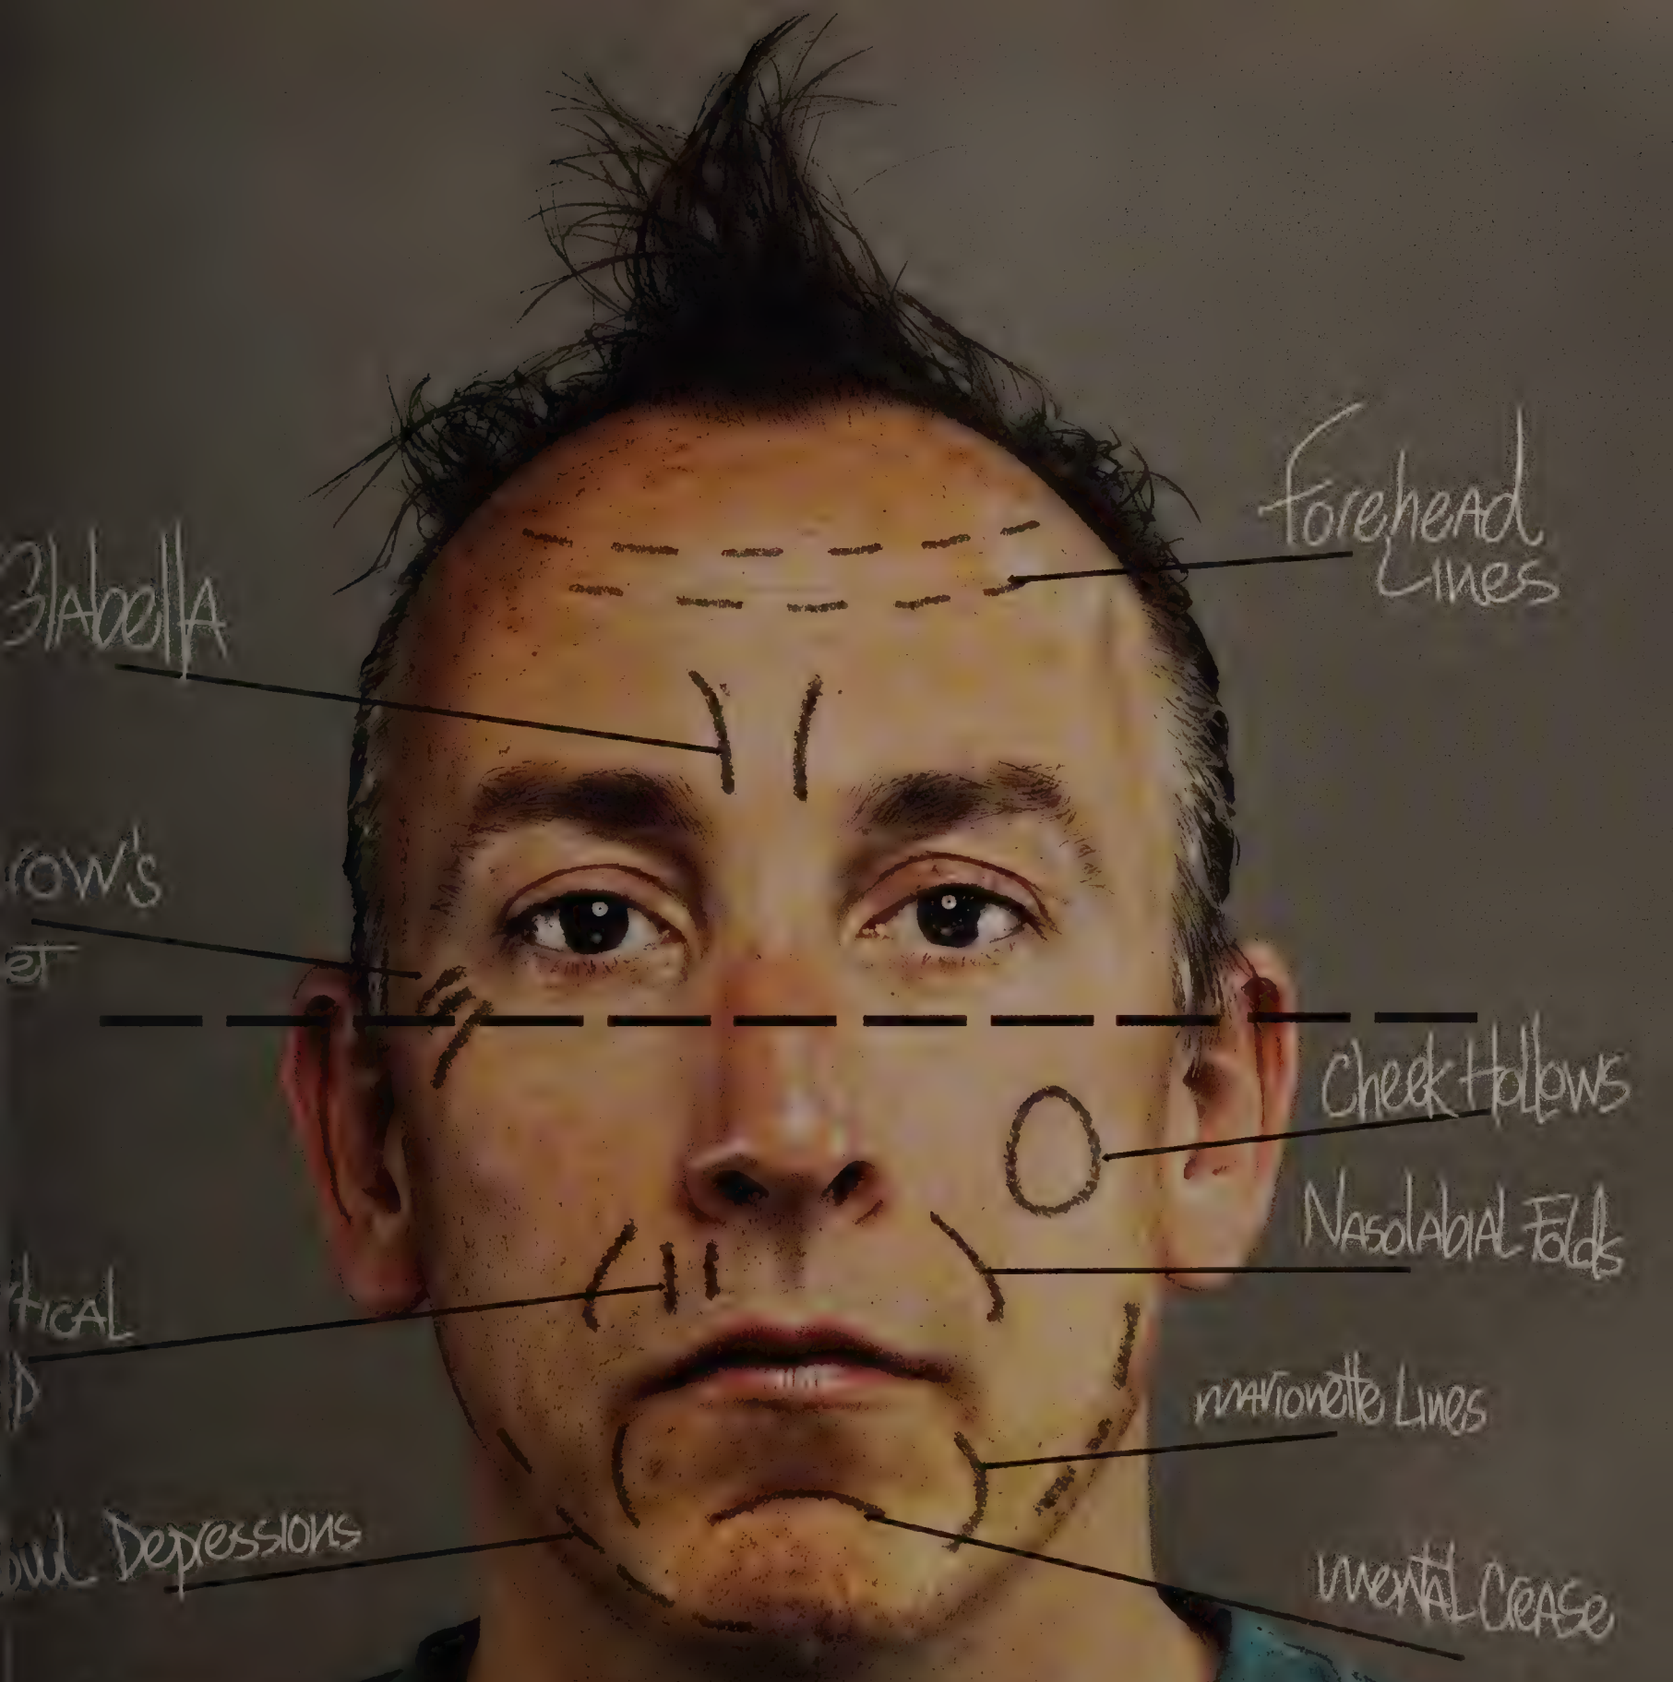
"It's completely unplanned!" he insists of the festivities. It can't hurt that, along with clothing, Kelly's mastered party planning and cooking. "I want it to be a 200-person picnic with a garden party kind of feel," he continues. "But I will fry the chicken myself before I spend $75,000!"

Despite his obvious female fan base, Kelly swears just as many men come up to him on the street as women (yes, straight men). "They'll say, 'I love the way you dress!' I feel like a lot of fashion guys out there are unrelatable to the average American man. I don't want to look like a caricature or a label whore."

Recognition doesn't always mean autograph requests and freebies, however. Sometimes it means having a thick skin. "This one girl tweeted that she saw me at the Macy's in Austin, and I had a really big forehead in person!" he laughs. "And I tweeted back, 'Be sure to introduce yourself to my big forehead today so I can point out some of your better physical qualities. It will be fun!'" Another viewer commented on YouTube, "I don't mind Stacy and Clinton as personalities, but [the show is] shallow really, and I hate the way they make it acceptable to make fun of people for something superficial. People past high school... should have more important things to think about."

"The thing about me is that I'm not really into fashion," Kelly responds. "I like [it], don't get me wrong, but I'm really into helping people develop a personal style. I'm not that fashion guy. I don't go to runway shows and say, 'Oooh, my God, that Margiela is fahhhhbulous.' I like to help people look better so they can get a better job or meet a partner they deserve to have." Thankfully, he's received more tequila shots than cheap shots. "I don't know how people like Brad Pitt, Angelina [Jolie] and Jennifer Aniston do it. What Britney Spears is doing with her life means nothing to me. I'm more interested in actual people." He flips through an issue of Entertainment Weekly on a coffee table and lands on a picture of reality stars Spencer Pratt and Heidi Montag. "I wouldn't know those two if I ran over them in my car," he says. "And something tells me I'd probably want to!"

Kelly has no patience for insta-celebrity or, in his line of work, insta-style. Women spend days with him before finding the right clothes, on camera and off. "I think he just really genuinely cares," Greenwald says. "I feel like he really looks at people and sees the beauty in them and wants them to see that, too. You can tell when you watch the show, and in person, too, when people look for the flaws in themselves it's frustrating to him. He wants them to look at all the things that are good." It's a formula that seems to work. "Walking down the runway, it just felt like I was a rock star," she adds. "I felt fabulous!" Boston down. Twelve cities to go. ✖✖✖



What's Wrong With Me?

A face dissected: Soroff asks the pros what they'd nip and tuck.

BY JONATHAN SOROFF PHOTOGRAPHS BY MATT TEUTEN

A FEW YEARS AGO (OK, at least 10), I was eating dinner at a nightclub in London. It was dark, and the Dover sole was good, so I didn't pay much attention when my friend Joan looked over my shoulder at the table next to us and said, "That poor woman! She must've been in a terrible fire."

I didn't turn around, but when I got up to use the men's room, I saw who she was talking about.

"She's not a burn victim," I said, returning to the table. "That's Jocelyn Wildenstein. She looks like that on purpose."

"What?!?"

"She's the wife of a billionaire art dealer. She had plastic surgery to make her look like a big cat."

Joan's jaw hit the floor.

That's pretty [illegible] I've always felt about plastic surgery. My mother was a successful model in the 1940s. She was a Miss Clairol and did Seventeen magazine covers. She was extraordinarily beautiful, constantly compared to Grace Kelly (and actually did a screen test with a competing studio). And she remained beautiful. A teenaged counselor at my summer camp asked her out when she was in her 40s.

So when she got old enough to even consider plastic surgery, she'd lament her "turkey waddle" or her flabby underarms, but she still insisted on "growing old gracefully." And into her 60s, she continued to turn heads: My oldest friend was horrified to realize that what he thought was a hot blonde at a red light was a woman who could remember him saying, "I just had an accident in my pants." That woman—who joked that chemo was "the only diet that actually works"—remained abidingly attractive and completely resistant to the idea of plastic surgery to the end.

And because of her, so was I.

And yet.

And yet.

I belong to the vainest of human subspecies: the aging gay male. Looks are our currency. Shallowness is a survival instinct. Plus, I'm 43. I'm 15 pounds fatter than I'd like to be, and I'm slowly but surely spreading, drooping and thickening in spots. I have friends 10 years my junior who treat Botox like a biannual teeth cleaning. It's sorely tempting.

Then someone will come along and say, "You're 43? Nah!!!!!!!!" or "You look exactly the same as the day I met you." Even disregarding ulterior motives like my seat at the bar or a ride home, I hear these things often enough to make me feel OK about myself. And in response, I usually quote my friend Janet, who says, "It's a combination of immaturity and expensive emollients." (For the record, I use Epicuren and Votre Vu products).

So, out of sheer, perverse curiosity, I decided to take a dip into the pool of Narcissus that is cosmetic surgery. I made appointments with two surgeons and one dermatologist to see what, if anything, they would suggest I do to improve my middle-aged self.

I'll give you the bottom line up front because it's the least interesting part about meeting with these doctors:

1) First they ask a patient: "When you look in the mirror, what bothers you?"

2) Most of the time, they think the person looks just fine and often counsel against doing anything medical, but…

3) If they honestly believe it would make the patient happy without causing harm, they'll do it.

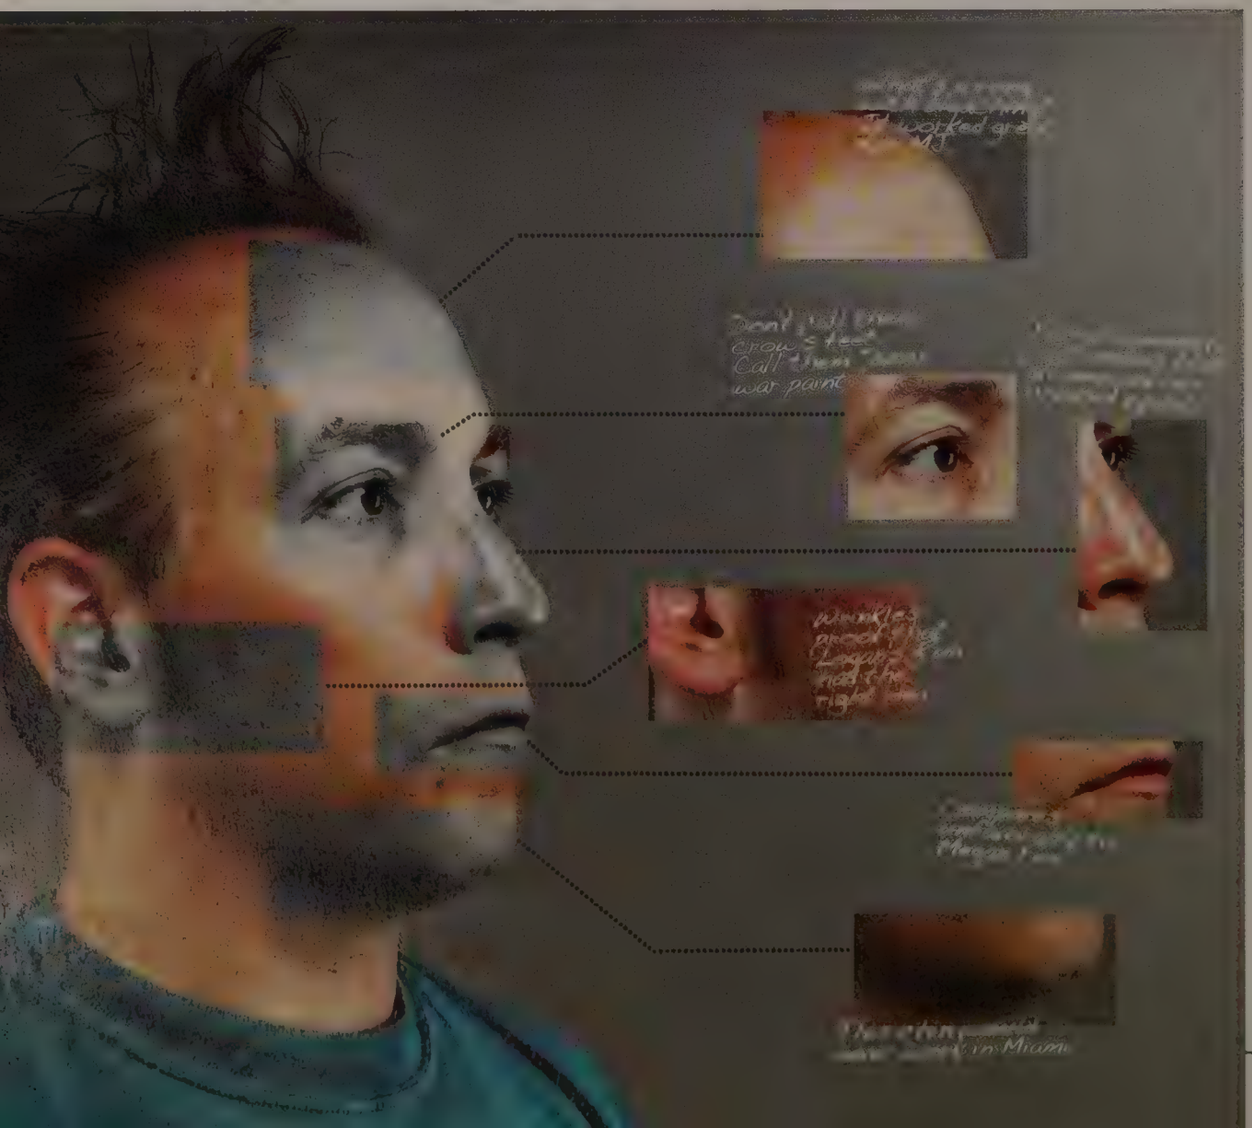
The Newbury Center is the perfect balance of relaxingly plush and reassuringly clinical. It looks like the waiting room of a psychiatrist's office in a Catherine Deneuve movie—even the phone and power chords are tastefully covered in ruched damask.

I'm asked to fill out an evaluation form that differs from the norm mostly in the psychiatric category: Have you received treatment, were you hospitalized, any recent crises in your life, treatment for drug or alcohol dependency? (All three of the doctors I consulted for this story emphasized that a great deal of their job involves psychological counseling. Or, as one of them put it: "If society wasn't completely insane, I wouldn't have any patients.")



Dr. Ramsey Alsarraf is lucky in two respects. First, his wife, Nicole, manages his practice and weeds out the crazies. These include 90-year-olds who expect to look like a Gossip Girl and teenagers who think they need a facelift (as well as people claiming to be vampires and therefore only available for a consult at night). Second, he only deals in the neck up, so the penis-size anxiety sufferers looking for an enlargement and the Double D's hoping for a triple are automatically ruled out.

We enter his consultation room, which could easily be upstairs at the Harvard Club. "I'm conservative, and most of the time I turn patients away because they're asking for more than I'm willing to do," Alsarraf says. "Like you. I honestly don't think you need anything. But when you look in the mirror, what bugs you?"

I admit that the dark puffiness under my eyes could go. He tells me his is way worse (and yet, when I ask him why he hasn't done something about it, he just shrugs and grins sheepishly). He says he could fix me with a lower-lid blepharoplasty (eye tuck) and some Botox (to rid me of the vertical frown lines, or "the 11," between the eyes). "But," he cautions. "I don't generally do brow lifts on men because it tends to effeminize their eyes." (I experience a "Eureka!" moment with respect to Bruce Jenner.)

Essentially, from the neck up, plastic surgeons do a handful of fairly standard procedures, the most popular being neck lift, face lift, eye lift, nose job and the injectables, which fall into two categories: the plumpers and the paralyzers. The paralyzers, like Botox, freeze muscles and are generally used only above the nose, while the plumpers, like Restylane, fill in lines and are generally used on the lower part of the face.

Of course, none of this is covered by health insurance.

Although there are doctors who will make the ethical stretch and pass off some cosmetic procedures as medically necessary, Alsarraf says that the sheer logistics of accepting insurance isn't worth the effort, and by the looks of things, his business is thriving. Even during the worst economy in the last 50 years, he says, "People still want to look good."

So what, I ask, would the pleasure of having my face taken care of by Alsarraf cost? In a creamy folder, on stationery you'd expect to find at a five-star hotel, the financial agreement is printed out, in calligraphy worthy of a wedding invitation. Without the Botox, just the tuck would cost around $6,300.

Is Alsarraf more expensive than other plastic surgeons? "Maybe a tiny bit," he says, "but not by much. And one thing that you're guaranteed with me is that anything requiring more than a mild or topical anesthetic will be done in a hospital."

The same is true of Dr. Leonard Miller, whom I catch at the end of a long day in his office near the Longwood hospitals. His is also posh, but much larger. Behind his leather-topped desk sits a bookshelf with leather-bound volumes and art from his native South Africa (along with stacks of patient files he needs to transcribe). He has his fellow countrymen's restless energy and no-bullshit attitude, along with the accent.

"Money drives a lot of what happens in plastic surgery," he admits, especially singling out the doctors in Hollywood and New York "who just want to make a fortune and do whatever a patient asks for." These are the authors of the facial trainwrecks like Michael Jackson, Joan Rivers, Meg Ryan and Marlo Thomas. Miller, on the other hand, sees his job as "doing pretty much anything a patient needs to feel happy about their appearance, without doing them any harm."

Does he like big fake boobs?

"Of course not."

Could you get them from him?

Possibly. He performs some breast augmentation (though he doesn't like the scars), as well as tummy tucks, butt lifts and all the above-the-neck procedures that Alsarraf offers. "My philosophy is that no one should look like they've had plastic surgery," Miller says. "And that's what I try to do."

He started his practice at a time when Bostonians were resistant to the idea of cosmetic work, but in the last 30 years, he's seen an explosion in popularity. "It's become much more acceptable. There's a critical mass of people who have done it."

We repair to his consultation room, where I remove my shirt. Miller looks at me and says, "You're muscular, which is good. And you're a tiny bit overweight."

Ouch.

"It's nothing you probably couldn't handle with diet and exercise," he continues, "but if you wanted, I could do liposuction to get rid of your love handles and that little bit of fat around your midsection. But not too much, because then you'd get wrinkles."

"Money drives a lot of what happens in plastic surgery."

Miller has done this dozens of times on rock stars and others whose occupations require them to be shirtless in public. "As you age, most men develop love handles. If it doesn't bother you, great. But if it does, that's what I'm here for."

So the cost for perfection? Between $4,500 and $7,000. "People think the more you charge, the better you are," Miller says, shaking his head. "So a lot of people go to these doctors in New York or wherever, and they often get overdone, because they expect these dramatic results." In other words, you get what you pay for.

Dr. Lynn Baden's dermatology office in Newton is the most clinical and medical of the three I visit. She doesn't perform surgery, but she does a good amount of cosmetic work, and when I ask her what she'd do to me, she jokes, "My first recommendation? I'd say the way you wear your hair, but you obviously like it that way."

Munching on baby carrots behind her desk, Baden lays out the full panoply of treatments she offers to beauty-seekers: the plumpers and paralyzers, different types of lasers to rid the skin of broken blood vessels and brown spots, thermage to heat the deep layers under the skin and stimulate collagen regeneration (collagen, she says, is "the cement that's holding everything up"), and cosmeceuticals. These include everything from Retin A (which, in addition to treating acne, can improve the look of aging skin) to antioxidants, glycolic peels and hydroquinones.

Of the three doctors I consult, Baden is the most vocal about the damaging effects of the sun. "Aside from the threat of skin cancer, it ages the skin terribly," she says. Being a sun-worshiper, I start to get nervous, and indeed, as she assesses me through a pair of bifocals, she picks out numerous flaws. "You could get filler to lessen the puffiness under your eyes. I could use a V-beam laser for the redness on your cheeks and nose. A laser would also remove the discoloration and brown spots on your scalp. You could do Botox across the forehead to minimize those lines. And you've lost some substance to your upper lip. I could plump that up."

"But I've always had thin lips," I protest.

"Maybe," she says. "But as you age, you lose bone and fat in the face."

Great. Something else to fret about. And the tally for all this home improvement? At this point, I'm so disheartened from contemplating my impending decrepitude that I neglect to ask Baden for a hard number. But suffice it to say that we're talking about thousands of dollars.

A friend of mine was once looking at a men's fashion magazine, and there was an ad for cologne, or underwear, or something where an improbably perfect-looking Adonis was standing there, all ripped abdomen, wrinkle-free and zero-percent body fat. "See? I want to look like that," he said. I should mention that this friend is a dedicated gym rat with a body to drool over and the prettiest eyes you've ever seen.

"No one looks like that," I said. "Not even that guy looks like that. At least not until they've lit and styled him, and then photo-shopped the hell out of his tiniest imperfection." I described to him what an editorial meeting is like at a magazine, when the cover is being scrutinized.

"You wouldn't believe it," I said. "You've taken this ideal specimen who won the lottery in terms of DNA, made her look ridiculously gorgeous through all kinds of artificial means, and then you're still sitting there, circling imperceptible shadows under her chin with a red grease pencil and saying her pores look too big."

I have my mother's old portfolio in my house, and in it are some reject photos: things like her modeling a skating costume, where she's supposedly gliding across the ice, except that you can see the thin wire holding her skirt up to make it look like she's moving. It's phony.

Which is basically how I've come to view cosmetic surgery. I'm with my mom. So I have bags under my eyes, a few wrinkles, a thinning upper lip, some discoloration, love handles and a bit of a spare tire. Who cares? I've decided that I don't. Especially since to fix all that would cost something in the neighborhood of $15,000, and I'm not sure that looking a few years younger is worth the money. Maybe I'll just start lying about my age. ✖✖✖

JUST SEAT IT

FOR MOST PEOPLE a futon has two functions: sit or sleep. But when contemporary artist Rodney McMillian gets his hands on one, he uses it to send a message. In his video Untitled (futon), McMillian takes a kitchen knife to home furnishings and unleashes his creative energies. It's not remodeling gone awry but a way to depict the negative aspects of domestic space, particularly in light of harsh economic times. See for yourself at the artist's first solo American exhibition, Momentum 14: Rodney McMillian, at the Institute of Contemporary Art. McMillian's show draws further inspiration from his personal effects, including a life-sized painting of his house and sculptures of damaged kitchen items. The exhibit is on display until Nov. 1. A Delicious Difference Party Savor Night after night eating the same thing... as with many creature comforts, routine quickly leads to boredom. Head to Taste of Park Plaza on Aug. 4 to sample an array of drinks and dishes. The options range from dinner at Bonfire Steakhouse and McCormick & Schmick's to dessert at Finale and Ben & Jerry's. An afterparty at Whiskey Park gives you a chance to mix and mingle, and perhaps shift your focus to other basic human needs. All proceeds benefit the Greater Boston Food Bank.

Panty Raid

A Brief Run A common nightmare is finding yourself out in public in nothing but your knickers. Thankfully, few of us ever awaken to that reality. But this unlucky happenstance befalls a character in Carl Sternheim's play The Underpants. Adapted by funnyman Steve Martin, the show centers on the life of a married couple after two suitors catch a glimpse of the wife's panties and do their best to woo her. Catch the comedy at the Salem Theatre until Aug. 2, but follow mom's advice and don't leave without putting on a clean pair.

Angels & Demons ★ Are these Dan Brown books as stupid as the movies they've spawned? I guess you can call Angels & Demons a step up from 2006's unspeakably turgid The Da Vinci Code, if only because it's more frantic and unhinged than that burnished, lethargic yak-fest. This boondoggle begins with a time bomb full of anti-matter (yes, kids, "anti-matter") stashed somewhere in Vatican City, and things only get more preposterous from there. Late game developments in this picture provoked peals of laughter the likes of which I've seldom heard at comedies. I daresay it's Ron Howard's funniest film since Splash. Tom Hanks reprises his role as surly Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon, with his charisma tamped down flatter than his unfortunate hairstyle. He wanders around pointing at statues and mumbling obscure art history footnotes while everyone else marvels at his intellectual prowess. Howard cranks up the Gregorian chant and keeps the lighting dim and the mood glum, but the material's inherent silliness throws the ponderous self-seriousness into sharp comic relief. (In the suburbs.)

Away We Go ★ ½ This is my least favorite kind of movie: one in which nothing is learned from others and no common humanity is shared. There's just a succession of straw-man arguments for a sad worldview that's established in the beginning and remains unchallenged all the way to the end credits. Literary supercouple Dave Eggers and Vendela Vida make the case for their own moral and intellectual superiority by penning roles for John Krasinski and Maya Rudolph, who play two go-nowhere goofballs having a baby. They decide to travel the country to find parents to model themselves after, only to realize that—despite having nothing to say or precious little to offer—they're much better off than all the rest of the cartoonish losers. It's a noxious ode to generational entitlement, and I swear, if I ever see another "soulful" shot of a movie character staring blankly into the camera while twee acoustic guitar music plays on the soundtrack, I'm going to travel back in time and kill Zach Braff before Garden State ever happens. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Brüno ★ ½ Failing miserably at everything his surprise 2006 smash Borat accomplished so brilliantly, gonzo character-comic Sacha Baron Cohen inhabits a preening gay fashionista seeking fame in the tawdry cesspool of celebrity culture. As the title character, Cohen prances around in various states of undress, taunting unwitting rubes while invading their personal space, presumably making some sort of statement about homophobia. But where Borat was able to elicit some revelatory moments of truth from Cohen's targets, most folks in Brüno refuse to take the bait, politely excusing themselves and wishing the weirdo would just leave them alone. He can't even summon anything embarrassing from a bunch of rednecks on a hunting trip, which is like shooting at fish in a barrel and missing. Cohen resorts to transparently staged bits and self-congratulatory celebrity cameos. A comedian as gifted as Cohen should understand that you can't tell the same joke twice and expect people to laugh. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Cheri ★★ ½ There's a mini Dangerous Liaisons reunion going on in Stephen Frears' latest. The director gets back with acid-tongued scribe Christopher Hampton, here adapting another French bedroom saga for star Michelle Pfeiffer. But the past 21 years have taken their toll, as Pfeiffer now plays a sassy, brassy woman of a certain age. (You know you're getting old when Pfeiffer is getting Glenn Close roles.) Culled from two novels, Hampton's surprisingly slender script begins with Pfeiffer's aging courtesan Lea agreeing to babysit slatternly Kathy Bates' wayward, dissolute son, Cheri (Rupert Friend). It's obvious that these two are crazy for each other, but societal mores won't allow it, so one hastily arranged marriage later, we're watching Michelle Pfeiffer elegantly suffer her way through a belle époque riff on He's Just Not That Into You. Frears is savvy enough to toy with his front-loaded iconography, using cinematographer Darius Khondji's harsh natural lighting to turn this twisted farce into a meditation on Hollywood's horrific treatment of aging actresses. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Drag Me to Hell ★★★ Taking a breather from his Spider-Man tent poles, Sam Raimi returns to his Evil Dead roots with this high-spirited

EXPLOSIVE

THE HURT LOCKER
Starring Jeremy Renner, Anthony Mackie, Brian Geraghty, Guy Pearce, David Morse and Ralph Fiennes. Written by Mark Boal. Directed by Kathryn Bigelow. At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.

IN THE FALL OF 2007, A WAVE of War-on-Terror–themed duds washed up on the shores of box office oblivion. The spectacular failure of star-studded sure things like In the Valley of Elah, Rendition, Lions for Lambs and Home of the Brave (starring Jessica Biel and 50 Cent!) spawned thousands of editorials and a fleet of pundits opining that "America just isn't ready for movies about Iraq."

Personally, I'd prefer to think that those pictures bombed not because of the public's reluctance to confront the issues, but because every once in a while people decide not to see lousy movies.

goof that's about as classy and sophisticated as the title would lead you to believe. Good sport Alison Lohman stars as a perky young banker who makes the mistake of denying a mortgage extension to a gypsy witch doctor. Faster than you can say "ancient curse," Raimi is off and running with dizzying corkscrew camera moves, shrieking sound effects and a cheerfully sophomoric procession of gross-outs. At times, Raimi, who penned the script with his brother Ivan, seems to be having a private contest to see how many icky fluids, flies and eyeballs he can land in Lohman's mouth. Lately, horror movies have become so downbeat and nasty that the exuberant showmanship here lends a pleasingly retro vibe. Drag Me has the cheeky, morality play spirit of Tales From the Crypt and an ending that's just about perfect. (In the suburbs.)

(500) Days of Summer ★★ ½ You can tell from the title's pointless parentheses—and the fact that the female lead is indeed regrettably named Summer—that this debut from music video director Marc Webb has no shortage of the cutesy indie quirk that usually causes this critic to retch in his popcorn bag. But a funny thing happens on the way to Juno territory, as the film keeps alternating between twee, look-at-me set pieces and lacerating truths not often depicted in romantic comedies. Joseph Gordon-Levitt falls head-over-heels for wide-eyed Zooey Deschanel, and the screenplay by Scott Neustadter and Michael Weber shuffles their ill-fated courtship into jarring, haphazardly juxtaposed days of blissful puppy love, waning interest and abject misery. It's basically He's Just Not That Into You for boys—with half of the running time spent warning you about the dangers of over-idealizing your object of desire, and the other half settling for banal, sitcommy tropes like the wise-beyond-her-years kid sister. It's a shame the movie keeps sheepishly backing away from its sharpest insights. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Hangover ★★★ This summer's out-of-nowhere blockbuster boasts a can't-miss premise: after a bachelor party gone wrong, three addled buddies wake up to a sea of Las Vegas sleaze, with no idea what happened to the groom. A bleary-eyed detective story follows, as these staggering malcontents attempt to piece together the previous evening. Director Todd Phillips, who helmed the similar man-child favorite Old School, still hasn't mastered the pacing required for such screwball comedy, but his cast comes to the rescue. The Office's Ed Helms once again uses his outward dorkiness to conceal a deep-seated anger, and star Bradley Cooper can't help but bring an unpleasant aggression to a character presumably intended to be much more endearing. The off-kilter energy is hammered home by alt-comedy icon Zach Galifianakis, who steals every scene not nailed down with his deadpan, wildly inappropriate reactions and perverted asides. The movie isn't always as funny as it likes to think it is, but this trio makes it feel dangerous. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince ★★ The previous Harry Potter film, 2007's rousing Order of the Phoenix, was a first for the Potterverse: a stripped down, focused humdinger that finally felt like one of JK Rowling's beloved

The Hurt Locker, director Kathryn Bigelow's pulverizing new nail-biter, is devoid of all the sanctimonious hand-wringing that bogged down the aforementioned Oscar-grubbers. It's first and foremost an action movie, so breathtaking in its suspense sequences and executed at such a high level of craftsmanship that any political baggage you brought in with you will be dropped once you've got a white-knuckled grip on the armrest.

Scripted by Mark Boal, a journalist embedded in Baghdad in 2004, The Hurt Locker spends a month with the men of an Army explosive ordnance disposal squad. These are the guys called in to dismantle IEDs and roadside bombs, a tricky task on its own before you add in the possible rooftop snipers or the awful likelihood that any random bystander with a cell phone could potentially detonate the device you're working on. The word "intense" hardly feels like an adequate description.

Anthony Mackie's Sgt. Sanborn plays things strictly by the book, working under the assumption that caution and protocol have kept him alive this long, so he might as well stick to 'em. Eldridge (Brian Geraghty) is starting to fray, has early signs of PTSD and frequent, confrontational visits with the base shrink.

Then we meet Staff Sergeant William James, played by Jeremy Renner in the kind of barn-burning performance that becomes the stuff of instant legend. Newly assigned to lead our battle-weary crew, he's a swaggering hot shot who appears to have no concern whatsoever for trifling matters like life and limb. He also happens to be bloody brilliant at his job.

James is an adrenaline junkie addicted to putting himself in danger. Sanborn and Eldridge can't quite figure out if all those times he saves their lives are worth how often he comes close to getting them killed. Renner plays James as a prickly enigma prone to odd silences and inappropriate jokes. With a cherubic face and an ever-so-slightly sinister bent, you can never quite get a bead on him.

Jonathan Olley

"Intense" hardly feels like an adequate description.

Structured as a one-damn-thing-after-another succession of traumatizing set pieces, Boal's script eschews sweeping pronouncements about the big picture in favor of boots-on-the-ground minutiae. (I don't recall Bush or Saddam ever being mentioned.) It's just a dirty job that somebody's gotta do, and thus the first hour or so of The Hurt Locker, with its matter-of-fact approach to these life-and-death skirmishes, feels like it's shaping up to be one of the greatest war films ever made.

A midmovie sniper battle, during which our protagonists find themselves painstakingly working a long-range rifle against insurgents holed-up miles away, is mesmerizing in its pace and precision. The loud crack of the gunshots, followed by an eerie, epic delay before impact, conjures a disembodying sensation that's impossible to shake. Bigelow directs the sequence like Sam Peckinpah's Wild Bunch shoot-out filtered through the druggy rhythms of a Gus Van Sant film.

Renner's Sgt. James is so compellingly inscrutable, The Hurt Locker can't help but suffer a bit when Bigelow and Boal eventually attempt to get to know him better. There's an abrupt perspective shift in the film's second half, as the crew's workaday nightmares take a backseat to a psychological exploration of James' self-destructive thrill-seeking. Basically, it stops being one of the best movies ever made and merely settles for being one of the best movies of the year.

Seeing James out of his element, stateside in suburbia, is like watching a recently landed extraterrestrial try to figure out the rules of his new world. Renner has no trouble taking apart a car loaded with explosives, but send him to the grocery store for some cereal and he's lost. Credit Bigelow with finding just the right angles to present supermarket shelves as spaces as overwhelming and intimidating as any brutal Baghdad back alley.

Independently financed and rolling out slowly to theaters over the coming weeks, The Hurt Locker is so skillfully crafted, it feels like an antidote to slapped-together junk like Transformers 2. Seek it out, and thank me later. ★★★ tomes had been effectively re-imagined in cinematic terms. For once, this Muggle began to understand what all the fuss was about. Alas, it's back to business as usual at Hogwarts with returning screenwriter Steve Kloves (who penned the first four but sat out the most recent picture) again transcribing an aimless grab bag of moments that don't serve much purpose beyond offering fans of the series some pretty pictures to look at. Sumptuously shot by the great cinematographer Bruno Delbonnel, the film is devoted to long scenes of folks delivering grave passages of exposition. All setup and no payoff, Half-Blood Prince never feels like a movie in its own right, just a lot of logistical scaffolding required to set the stage for the final chapter. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Public Enemies ★★★★ Form becomes content in Michael Mann's audacious take on the final days of John Dillinger, a bank-robbing cowboy adrift in a modern world. Johnny Depp tones down his usual theatrics to play the master thief as a man just out of prison who's living for no future or no past, just an extremely precarious present. Shooting in trembling, hi-def digital video with mostly handheld cameras, Mann upends the traditional grammar of a gangster period piece and avoids the expected establishing shots of lavish 1930s art decoration in favor of nerve-jangling close-ups and experimental editing techniques. The deliberately alienating style doesn't just mirror the immediacy of Dillinger's moment-to-moment existence, it also makes explicit his bafflement at this shimmering new landscape, where both J. Edgar Hoover's Bureau of Investigation and Frank Nitti's mafia goons employ technological wonders that render an old-school desperado like our hero obsolete. Love it or hate it, Mann's technique is some sort of breakthrough. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Soloist ★★ Robert Downey Jr. stars as L.A. Times columnist Steve Lopez, a motor-mouthed depressive who befriends a homeless, schizophrenic musical prodigy, played by Jamie Foxx. Lopez writes an inexplicably popular series of columns, congratulating himself for befriending Foxx's babbling musician. This scores him a book deal and some journalism awards, but poor Foxx is still out on the street, mumbling to himself and playing Beethoven on a broken violin. Susannah Grant's screenplay spends a moment or two wondering how much of this "friendship" is really opportunistic exploitation on Lopez's part, but the movie is too cowardly to stay there for very long. The Soloist moves about in a muddle, never quite sure of what story it's supposed to be telling. Flashbacks to Foxx's traumatic childhood and mental breakdown are interlaced with mundane details about Downey's broken marriage, until it becomes one of those movies where the minority figure's tragic fall is just another way for the callous white guy to learn important life lessons. (In the suburbs.)

Star Trek ★★★ ½ What a wonderful surprise. It takes serious gall to recast characters as iconic as Captain Kirk and Mr. Spock with fresh-faced barely-knowns. Sure, there's a shiny coat of CGI paint and everybody's impossibly good-looking, but director JJ Abrams has captured the upbeat sense of adventure that defined Gene Roddenberry's original 1960s' series. More so than any Trek project in decades, this one captures the camaraderie, the easy humor and, most important, the swagger that we associate with the headstrong Kirk and his logical, pointy-eared pal. Much like Casino Royale, Abrams' Star Trek finds ingenious ways to serve up familiar pleasures. Rare for a landscape dominated by dour popcorn blockbusters, this one isn't afraid to be fun. All the phaser battles, sexy green girls and transporter beam antics you'd expect are present, just with slightly unexpected spins. The film's rousing finale ends with the Enterprise crew at last assembled and warping off to what we can only hope will be a happy series of sequels. May they live long and prosper. (Simons IMAX and in the suburbs.)

Summer Hours ★★★ ½ French writer/director Olivier Assayas often suffers from a pedantic streak a mile wide. But this quiet, devastating family drama plays to his strengths, with three squabbling siblings sorting out what to do with their late mother's estate. Playing the heartsick eldest, Charles Berling attempts to keep the family's posh country compound intact as a refuge for future generations, while younger Juliette Binoche and Jeremie Renier just want to cash in and move on with their cosmopolitan lives. Assayas pays as much attention to the objects in the frame as he does to these characters, as he lavishes furniture or the artwork on the walls with symbolic importance. Saying a lot, but never out loud, the film allows the dispersal and auction of these material things to stand in for the dissolution of a family over time. (West Newton Cinema and in the suburbs.)

The Taking of Pelham 123 ★★ Director Tony Scott's pointless remake of Joseph Sargent's 1974 classic keeps the basic premise, as a scenery-chewing John Travolta hijacks a Manhattan subway car, much to the chagrin of Denzel Washington's weary, everyman dispatcher. But this slick redux misplaces the attitude, which is everything. The original wasn't much of a nail-biter but still remains a cherished cult favorite thanks to its time-capsule vision of a crumbling, battle-weary New York City. Scott's hyperactive version employs web cams, Wi-Fi gadgets, freeze frames and swooping helicopter shots of overwrought car crashes to oversell a story that was already foolproof. Only James Gandolfini, playing a disgraced mayor waiting out the end of his term, musters a level of droll cynicism that matches the previous picture. (In the suburbs.)

Terminator Salvation ★ At least now we know why Christian Bale was so angry. A scant 25 years after James Cameron's low-budget thriller made a superstar out of California's future governor, a hack director who preposterously insists on calling himself McG has at last run the franchise into the ground. Bale barks a single, repetitive note as John Connor, humanity's humorless savior, who, thanks to time travel's pretzel logic, must rescue his teenage father (Anton Yelchin) from a lot of noisy, clanking robots and some patently offensive Holocaust allusions. There's also much ado about a befuddled cyborg, blandly played by Sam Worthington, who seems as confused as we are as to what purpose his character serves. Lacking a clear antagonist or any discernable reason to exist, Terminator Salvation suffers from a parched, ugly color palette and offers no relief from the grim funeral tone. (In the suburbs.)

Transformers: Revenge of the Fallen NO STARS Michael Bay has outdone himself and made a movie bigger, louder, longer and dumber than the godforsaken original Transformers. Again, there's no sense of joy or whimsy, nothing but the pulverizing fetishization of militaristic, alpha-male privilege. All women are spray-tanned skanks dressed like strippers, and every minority is a grotesque, ineffectual cartoon. An early set-piece is devoted to savoring the destruction of a library. Then we meet "Amos 'n' Android"—comic-relief robots modeled on monkeys who speak jive and flash gold teeth. (Bay's big punch line is that they can't read!) Eventually, even President Obama gets dragged into this mess, here ridiculed for attempting diplomacy with gigantic killer robots. Luckily, our heroes know better, so when a bespectacled, articulate representative of the new administration argues for transparency and accountability, the good guys promptly throw him out of a plane and go save the world by invading a Middle Eastern country. There's also a robot with enormous wrecking balls dangling from his crotch that serve as destructive testicles. This is what you asked for, America. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Up ★★★★ The geniuses at Pixar Animation Studios have done it again. This tall tale of an aging widower (voiced by Ed Asner) flying his house to South America with helium balloons has no right to be so emotionally powerful, but writer/director Pete Docter weighs down the bizarre flights of fancy with sharp human sadness. Somehow the movie manages to include a 13-foot female bird named Kevin, an army of talking dogs and some spectacular action sequences while never losing sight of the moving human drama. Breathtakingly animated, Up has more strange and beautiful images than can possibly be listed here, but perhaps none more so than the crumbling old home, born aloft by thousands of brilliantly colored balloons. It's a ridiculous conceit that pays off rich metaphorical dividends, as our protagonist must learn that it's time to let go. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Whatever Works ★★ ½ So there's this older, balding Jewish guy with glasses. Kind of a nebbish, he's obsessed with death, hates people and spends most days walking around his beloved New York City suffering panic attacks while obsessing about the intellectual degeneration of the human race and the meaninglessness of our existence. By all standards physically unattractive, he still manages to spew so many brilliant one-liners that he scores the carnal affections of a hot, up-and-coming actress who happens to be a fraction of his age. Have you figured out that we're in a Woody Allen movie yet? Whatever Works, which is, by my count, Allen's 39th stint as a writer/director, has nothing new to offer. It's stagey, half-baked and overly reliant on lazy caricatures and cheap zingers. But I'd be lying if I said it doesn't have its fair share of laughs. Credit most of them to star Larry David, whose sandpaper delivery lends a refreshing edge of aggression to extremely familiar territory. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

X-Men Origins: Wolverine ★ After an acrimonious split with series director Bryan Singer following 2003's nifty X2: X-Men United, 20th Century Fox seemed lost on how to proceed with their superhero franchise. First X3: The Last Stand scrapped Singer's carefully developed allegories of alienation and killed off the most interesting characters, and now Wolverine seeks to demystify the tragic history of Hugh Jackman's cigar-chomping scene-stealer. As far as revelations go, the movie doesn't offer much that wasn't already covered in X2. The only surprises here are the dour mood, shoddy special effects and complete absence of levity. Directed by Gavin Hood, who recently helmed the rancid war on terror melodrama Rendition, Wolverine takes itself remarkably seriously for a movie about a man with knives coming out of his knuckles. It's a somber affair, and Jackman is forced to tamp down the character's roguish Han Solo charms in favor of a lot of brooding, scowling and howling. No more of these, please. (In the suburbs.)

The Lost Diaries

Talking 'Bout a Revolutionary

Anyone who has stepped foot on a college campus has seen Che Guevara's portrait emblazoned on a T-shirt or a dorm wall. But separating the man from the myth has always been tricky: Was he a hero or a cold-blooded killer, an idealist or an opportunist? Steven Soderbergh presents his take on the Marxist revolutionary in this two-part epic, Che, starring Benicio Del Toro in the title role. The Brattle Theatre screens both segments back-to-back in this special return engagement Aug. 1–2.

ROOTS ROULET

Bonnie Raitt and Taj Mahal share history.

Bonnie Raitt and Taj Mahal's BonTaj Roulet plays the Bank of America Pavilion Aug. 15.

IT'S HARD FOR AN INTERVIEWER to get a word in edgewise when Bonnie Raitt and Taj Mahal warmly riff off each other's thoughts in a conference call from their Bay Area homes.

The two longtime friends share common roots in their broad, blues-steeped music and mutual Massachusetts history. And they've headed out on their first-ever tour as headliners, performing separately and together, at the Cape Cod Melody Tent Aug. 14 and the Bank of America Pavilion Aug. 15.

"Taj has been doing international music from before world music was a genre," Raitt says of fellow Grammy Award winner Mahal, a Springfield native who has stirred rock 'n' roll, jazz, calypso and African music into his folk-blues gumbo over the past 40 years. "I admire his musical curiosity and his appetite and his passion. He's been an inspiration to me all this time as well as a friend."

"It's the industry that puts everything in a box," Mahal responds in his gravelly voice. "The real world doesn't live that way. Here in the United States, the bulk of the African-American community has no idea what the Grateful Dead are like. You go down into the Caribbean or to Africa and they know the Grateful Dead as 'American' music."

Raitt, whose repertoire can swing from folk-rocker Richard Thompson's "Dimming of the Day" to a tune by reggae group Toots and the Maytals, echoes that openness. "People say, 'Why don't you make a blues album and tour with that?'" she says. "I'd be so bored if I had to play one kind of music."

The two artists formally met when Raitt opened for Mahal at Skidmore College in upstate New York circa 1970. But they first crossed paths in the late '60s on the Cambridge club circuit. "I had come to see Taj at the Club 47 [now Club Passim], but I was just a civilian at that point," says Raitt, who majored in social relations and African studies at Harvard. However, she befriended promoter Dick Waterman and soon sat in with blues greats who took a shine to the sassy young redhead with the buttery slide-guitar touch.

"I'd be so bored if I had to play one kind of music," Raitt says.

"I got handed a career," says the 59-year-old singer, who signed to Warner Brothers in 1971 (Mahal coproduced her 1973 album Takin' My Time) and finally snagged four Grammys in the wake of 1989's Nick of Time. "I had no intention or expectation to ever get a record deal or do anything other than open up for Buddy Guy or JB Hutto or get to know Chris Smither, John Hammond and Taj Mahal and hang out."

Mahal (born Henry Fredericks) and the California-bred Raitt both hailed from musical families. Her father was Broadway star John Raitt (they sang together with the Boston Pops in 1992) and her mother was a pianist. His father was a jazz pianist/arranger, his mother sang gospel and his Jamaican stepfather played guitar. "He refurbished the basement with linoleum tile floor and knotty pine walls and a big sound system," recalls Mahal, 67. "I was used to adults dancing."

When he began playing gigs, first in doo-wop and then R&B, the singer/guitarist recounts, "Everybody said, 'You can't make a living at it. Basically, you got to sell out.' I said, 'Nah, nah, nah, you can't tell me everybody in the world is trying to sell out. You're listening to the wrong band.'"

"Man, I wish I'd been around in that era," Raitt says. "The age difference between us was just enough that you got Boston and Cambridge and all those scenes at such a richer time.... People say, 'You got to be in the '70s.' But to be able to go hear R&B bands and big bands and Caribbean bands live, and dance to them, that's something I didn't get."

Certainly the pair's BonTaj Roulet tour (which donates a dollar per ticket for causes which fans prioritize through voting at bontaj.com) aims for social and musical kinship before commercial clout. Raitt says she had the idea for the partnership years ago and wants to franchise it like Lilith Fair and add guests in the future. For now, beside sets with their respective groups, Raitt and Mahal plan a turn as an acoustic duo in addition to fronting their combined bands for a half-hour finale.

"We're going to have a blast," says Raitt, admitting that it will be hard for her not to sit in with Mahal and his Phantom Blues Band the entire night. "That's the thing about slide guitar: you can lay it on top of anything." ***

Hat Trick

Mrazzle Dazzle After John Mayer accepted his Grammy for Best Male Pop Vocal Performance this year, he immediately tweeted that his win should be shared with singer/songwriter Jason Mraz. Seven years after the release of his debut album, Mraz has achieved mainstream stardom, with three Grammy nominations and "I'm Yours," originally a leaked demo that is now the fifth best-selling digital single of all time. The San Diego-based artist, known for his playfully witty lyrics and lightning-speed delivery, shows his appreciation for music and his followers in his Gratitude Café Tour, which will donate a portion of every ticket sold to the VH1 Save the Music Foundation. The tour stops by the Bank of America Pavilion Aug. 4–5. Samantha Lear

Time Warp

Beatnik Generation There's more to the '50s than poodle skirts, greasers, and spontaneous bursts of song and dance. Take a trip down memory lane with DeCordova Museum and Sculpture Park's The Old, Weird America exhibit, featuring works that depict pivotal eras in our country. Photographer Charlie White's "1957" photo is just one of many that will leave you feeling nostalgic through Sept. 7. Borana Greku

Audiosyncrasy

Well-Versed When performers test their skills in new territories, the results aren't always pretty (remember Michael Jordan in the outfield?), but indie crooner Joe Pernice uses his songwriting savvy for novel purposes. His debut, It Feels So Good When I Stop, follows the troubles of a newlywed musician with a commitment phobia who runs off to Cape Cod. On Aug. 5, Pernice presents and performs songs from his book—yes, there's a soundtrack—at the Brattle Theatre, alongside Boston-bred comedians the Walsh Brothers. Kristen Ciccolini

IMPROPER Sightings!

ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER CHEWING A STICK OF DOUBLEMINT AT THE TWINS DAY FESTIVAL, HELD AUG. 7–9 IN TWINSBURG, OHIO.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

H. Steven Kennedy caught up with former "Tonight Show" bandleader Kevin Eubanks at Seattle's Jazz Alley. Good thing Kennedy didn't bring our "Boston's Best" issue... awkward!

Gretchen Keisel and Elizebeth Sobotka are all smiles in Amsterdam. In the background, a recent coffee shop patron has an altercation with her backpack.

Curt Comber and Tracey Vetterick got cozy in an Icelandic hot spring. Judging by his grin, we'd say Comber's in the process of making it a little hotter.

We were lucky to get this photo with U.S. Ambassador to Armenia Marie Yovanovitch. Or as she's known in diplomatic circles, Y to the izzo, V to the izzay.

Last Scene Here { JONATHAN SOROFF }

FANCY DANCE

A Dose of Reality

For a treacly TV talent show, Dancing With the Stars seems innocuous enough (OK, I admit: Last season, I was a little obsessed with that rodeo guy who's married to Jewel).

So naturally I said yes when Fields Corner Main Street (a community-building non-profit in that corner of Dorchester) asked me to be a judge at their Dancing With the Stars of Boston fundraiser.

Little did I know that I'd be sitting next to JoJo White (the only NBA great I've ever had a crush on), or that before the competition (which was held at BC High), I'd meet Miss Teen Massachusetts, Katie Vatalaro, along with recording sensation Ayla Brown (who actually survived the meat-grinder of American Idol and performed a few tracks from her new album).

Fortified by some wine and finger food, I joined my fellow judges—besides White, there was last year's winner, Mary Truong, and Latino media star Alberto Vasallo III—on the side of the stage. WCVB-TV Channel 5's David Brown and Karen Holmes-Ward, the emcees, predicted that I would turn out to be the Simon Cowell of the group (which confirms my suspicion that Cowell and Ryan Seacrest are lovers).

And then came the competition: fitness guru Andrea Baptiste did a samba, power-couple Joan Wallace Benjamin and Milton Benjamin did a fox trot, current Miss Massachusetts Alison Cronin and real estate mogul Craig Galvin did waltzes, stand-up comic Corey Manning did a merengue, WCVB-TV Channel 5 weather babe JC Monahan salsa'd and auto magnate Vinnie Than tangoed.

Suffice it to say they were all amazing, and in the end, it doesn't really matter who won. (Visit fieldscorner.org to find out and make a donation while you're there.) But, for the record: JoJo White was way more Simon Cowell than I was (which confirms my fear that somewhere, deep down inside me, lingers a tiny bit of Paula Abdul).

Age Is Only a Number

Not to toot my own horn (I prefer others to do it for me), but the 80th Jubilee Celebration for Her Serene Highness Doris Yaffe (social activist, citizen of the world and possessor of wisdom of the ages) was one helluva party.

First of all, it was held at the Achilles Project/ Persephone (only the coolest of venues for Her Highness) and hosted by her sons, Peter and Jeff, along with me and my better half, Sam Mazzarelli, Sag Harbor's hybrid of Jackson Pollack and Kurt Cobain, Dave-O, and the W Hotel's Jack Yeaton. Then there were the guests, who included gorgeous Mimi Stith and her mother, Deborah (bearing greetings from her husband, the ambassador, who was off in Africa), legendary editor Matt Storin, arts impresario Joe Spaulding, German aristocrat Lexie Gross, white-hot decorator Duncan Hughes... and those were just the people who gave toasts.

Katie Vatalaro and Soroff at Dancing With the Stars

Ayla Brown and her father, State Senator Scott Brown, at Dancing With the Stars

Miguel de Braganca at Doris Yaffe's birthday

Soroff and Doris Yaffe at her birthday party

Wellies at Tanglewood

Dora Lewin and Joyce della Chiesa at Tanglewood

Following cocktails and hors d'oeuvres, troubadour par excellence Miguel de Braganca sang and played guitar (accompanied on one number by his mother, Sukey), and the evening's honoree delivered a highly comprehensive and side-splitting speech paying tribute to all the women she'd ever known who were ahead of their time.

I, for one, got drunk and had a blast, and it seemed like everyone else did, too, given that the evening didn't end until they kicked us out of a restaurant in Chinatown.

So, again: Happy Birthday, Mrs. Magoo. And many happy returns.

Rain, Rain, Go Away

Not that it ever dampens guests' spirits, but a monsoon of biblical proportions seems to occur every Opening Night at Tanglewood (the Boston Symphony's summer home in the Berkshires).

This year, Mother Nature actually managed to drop buckets of rain on the tent while the sun simultaneously shone (a nifty trick). As all the VIPs were shuffling into the swanky pre-concert dinner, one woman was overheard saying, "Get me out of this wet dress and into a dry martini." Afterward, everyone was transported, via golf cart, through the muck, to the Shed for the all-Tchaikovsky program (conducted by James Levine and featuring pianist Yefim Bronfman).

But even the aforementioned mud couldn't subdue party-animals like the über-fabulous Elyse Etling and Lauren Joy. The ladies didn't want to sit inside, but they also didn't want their kicky sandals getting ruined on the lawn. Their solution? Going to the gift shop and buying wellies covered in musical notes—proof positive that lesbians with tremendous style exist outside shows like The L Word. ✖✖✖

Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. stellaartois.com

Love Thy Neighbors

My husband and I take the baby on the same stroll through the South End most weekends. Too sleep-deprived to get creative, we often need a little nudge to vary our routine. Usually our motivation is food, and last Saturday Sofra's beet tsatsiki lured us across the river. It reminded me that a world exists beyond the swings in Sparrow Park.

Ezra explores the city in this issue with a scavenger hunt covering four neighborhoods. His ridiculous romp features characters like "Casey from Southie," a fast-talker with Boston tattooed up his forearm. In another article, Cambridge crossword constructor Brendan Emmett Quigley reveals his own quirks. Known among puzzlers for his pop-culture clues, Quigley plays in a typewriter band.

So what's seven letters for horror film auteur? Eli Roth—our cover guy. Roth, a Newton native, makes slasher movies for the cerebral crowd (Cabin Fever, Hostel). In a bold move, he goes from director to actor in Quentin Tarantino's Inglourious Basterds this month. It's another reason to leave the house.

Home Cooking

LOCAL FLAVOR

THE PLANTAIN, THAT GLUTEY cousin to the common banana, is the (slightly bent) pillar of Dominican cooking. "We eat plantains for breakfast, lunch and dinner," laughs Nivia Piña, co-owner of Merengue, a popular Dominican restaurant in Roxbury. "For breakfast we boil them. For lunch and dinner we fry them ripe or green. We make mofongo," a sort of garlicky plantain mash.

But a plantain is nothing without rice and beans, or steak and onions, or fried chicken chunks, or empanadas. Piña, a Puerto Rican native, and her Dominican-born husband, Hector, have built a "mini-industry" on the basis of such delicacies. In 15 years, they've grown from a humble start as a local fry shop into a 90-seat restaurant with a catering arm and 13 employees. Hector, 50, started Merengue without even knowing how to cook. "But he knew how to eat!" teases his wife, 34, a Brandeis graduate with a master's in biochemistry.

"It's a misconception that people have about Latino food, that they think it's going to be hot," says Piña, who oversees the catering business while studying for a master's in education. The primary condiments she uses are olive oil, garlic and oregano. It's proved a successful recipe, as Merengue has reached past Roxbury's Latino enclave to attract regulars from as far away as Providence and New Hampshire. Still, the restaurant has a budget for donations to local charities, and Hector sits on the board of Project Right. Says Piña, "Roxbury is our community."

Drink of the Moment

Wireless (With Strings Attached)

In 1903, on a stretch of sand near Wellfleet, Mass., Guglielmo Marconi sent the country's first wireless transatlantic communication—a short greeting from Teddy Roosevelt to King Edward VII. The beach was later named after him, and at some point, so was a cocktail. The Marconi Wireless consists of two parts applejack, one part sweet vermouth and a couple dashes of orange bitters. As a Wellfleet regular in the warm months, I decided to hunt down the drink in its natural habitat.

Nobody had any idea what I was talking about. At the Pearl, shots were wagered between the manager and the bartender over whether the cocktail even existed in their recipe book. Patrón was poured, but no Wireless. Switching plans, I tried the liquor stores, hoping to at least buy the ingredients. But a request to one clerk regarding the applejack's location brought a look of such disgust I thought I had something on my face.

Back in the city, I made a series of unfruitful calls before dialing a place guaranteed to deliver. "Yeah, I've heard of it," Eastern Standard bartender Nicole Lebedevitch casually reported, and soon I was sipping my first Marconi Wireless ($10). The taste is more autumnal than I'd expected, like a Manhattan with a lingering, acidic citrus spice, but after a day on the beach, it'd knock the salt out of your mouth better than a Coors Light. It'll be an excellent drink for late summer, when the romance of being the last one on the beach fades with the slow, creeping chill of the upcoming season. Just remember to bring your own ingredients.

Good Eats

How Saucy

Noodles with meat sauce sounds like an inherently Italian idea, but the combination is equally familiar to Sichuan kitchens—chef Zhang Wenxue's, in particular. His chili-peppered dishes (steamed beef, Sichuan-style; bean curd with special sauce; bang bang chicken) have lured many a Chinese foodie out to Malden Center. But as a foil to the fire, we prefer a heat-free option. Slippery, chewy mung bean noodles feature a gravy made of rice vinegar, soy sauce, shredded pork, raw cucumber and carrot matchsticks. Cilantro stems finish it off.

Going Out

BACK TO BUSINESS

It's Friday morning, and after taking the bar the day before, Philip Frattaroli is back at Ducali, where he'll work the bar until 1 am. "I'm probably going to hate that word in a couple weeks," he concedes.

Frattaroli, 27, grew up in the business—his relatives own Filippo, Artu and Lucia in the North End. After a space by the Charlestown Bridge stayed dormant for months, he took his shot. "I wanted a place for people our age to hang out, get a pizza, drink a beer," Frattaroli says, looking around his 58-seat restaurant, menus glued to the wall like street adverts. "Now in the North End, it's places run by old men for other old men."

Unlike the neighborhood's traditional pies, his pizzas are made in a Neapolitan style—thinner and lighter with undefined crusts like a margherita ($7.50, individual; $14) and the tre porcellini with sausage, salami and pancetta ($11; $21). Explains Frattaroli, "I lived in New York for a year, and there's this artisan movement there where people take pride in their dough and the sauces, and that's what I wanted to do."

He also returned to the business for family. After his kid brother, Mark, an industry enthusiast he nicknamed Pizza Boy, died in an accident, his priorities shifted. "As a lawyer, you deal with people at the worst point in their lives," Frattaroli explains. "At restaurants, people come to celebrate and have fun."

Three weeks in, things are coming together: His father lent tables, his sister invented the house dessert, a mural of the winged lion of St. Mark was painted on the wall. "I always told people I went to law school to get out of the restaurant business," says Frattaroli, who's still undecided about his legal aspirations. "But it's been fun as a family, doing this together."

Beauty

NEEDLE POINTS

To my delight, the Chuan Body + Soul Spa at the Langham added cupping and acupuncture to their list of treatments this month—making them the first hotel in Boston to offer such services. With plans to wear a swimsuit two days later (and memories of Gwyneth's back at a 2004 film premiere), I forewent cupping and decided to try acupuncture. To start, I told my therapist Rebekah Michaels all my ailments (headaches, stress, anxiety) so that she could literally pinpoint where to make the insertions along my Chi channels. I remained a little tense throughout the process, thinking, "This is going to be the one that really hurts." Thankfully, only one or two felt like small mosquito bites. Once I fully resembled a voodoo doll, Michaels turned off the lights and let me relax for about 20 minutes, allowing my body to react. But it wasn't until my cab ride home that I fully felt the effects. The entire car could've spontaneously burst into flames, and I probably would've calmly gathered my belongings, adjusted my outfit and slowly exited the vehicle—I was that mellow. It was like one huge tranquilizer dart in the form of many microscopic needles, minus the lethargy. I'm now a junkie.

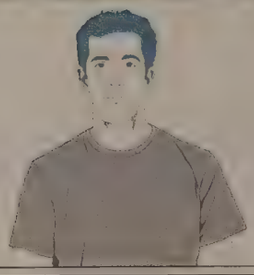
IT'S ALL IN YOUR HEAD

Changing stress into solace

WHEN WE'RE depressed, the dark, sinister feelings these authors refer to as "ruminating" hold center stage. Some useless blend of failing to make changes while soaking in misery prevails, while bad thoughts about ourselves solidify into intractable reality. Mindfulness meditation, by contrast, offers a refreshing antidote by way of a powerful shift in orientation. It helps put worries at a distance in an imagined place, where feelings and thoughts can be conceived of as airy passing things and not hard facts.

Inviting a peaceful, semi-hypnotic state—like the drowsy gazing one does in the hot sun—the writers stroll you through a "body scan" (explained on an accompanying CD). The exercise helps you observe, without clinging to, locations of stress, almost as if this "you" were a third person, objectively witnessed. A sort of "hmm, OK, sure" attitude drifts in. "Doing" is replaced by the more philosophical "being."

The Mindful Way Through Depression
by Mark Williams, John Teasdale, Zindel Segal and local meditation maven Jon Jabat-Zinn



The scientists offer tools for finding peace.

Detached in this way, you're released to become curious, compassionate, even mildly amused. Spaciousness, mindfully cultivated, helps neutralize and change suffering. One woman's depression, visualized as a large rock, is still there, but now she imagines it being caressed gently by the ocean's comforting waves. ***

Nick and Choose { NICK ALTSCHULLER }

CONSTELLATION PRIZE

Nick greets the dawning of four days of Aquarius.

I PUT TOO MUCH STOCK IN my psychic abilities. If I catch myself thinking, "Whatever happened to Ogre from Revenge of the Nerds?" and then I later see him playing a barbarian in a Capital One ad, I feel like I've somehow conjured him into existence.

With such far-reaching powers as the ability to get D-list actors work, I've never held much faith in the clairvoyance of others. Tarot cards, tea leaves, Magic 8 Balls, there are too many options, and they can't all be right. When I was a kid, a palm reader at a county fair told me if I was a good boy, and if I didn't use drugs, I'd turn out fine. Thanks for nothing, lady.

Deciding to further explore soothsaying, I consulted Eugenia Last's Astrological Forecast in The Globe, because if you can't find valuable guidance next to Doonesbury, really, where can you turn? I gave Eugenia four days.

Monday: "Good things will come from an unexpected source. A friend will be there to back you if you need help and encourage you to follow through with your plans."

Nothing good arrived, which proved the forecast both inaccurate and depressing, but my friend John did come over to help me in my plan to install an air conditioner. Of course pieces were missing, so there was no real follow-through. It seems even though a friend came to my aid, the universe (and Sears) was still there to screw me. And now I have a wobbly window unit one unlucky nudge away from plummeting to the sidewalk. Hopefully my future doesn't hold involuntary manslaughter charges. Horoscope accuracy (out of 5): 2.5.

Tuesday: "Someone you thought you knew well will let you down."

Do I have good friends or bad, horoscope? Make up your mind.

That night my friend Adam and I lucked into luxury box seats at Fenway, and as Adam savored our 6-2 lead and his fourth Heineken, he said, "I hope this game goes into extra innings." Of course we blew the lead and ended up losing in the 11th, but I already knew that would happen. The man is a military-grade jinx—but apparently better at predicting the future than Eugenia Last. Accuracy: 1.

Wednesday: "Be honest about what you did and didn't contribute or you may be questioned or put in an awkward position."

It's date night, and a time when I would rather pour the soup du jour down my pants than be forthright, so bring on the awkwardness!

Nothing. After a few jokes and some lively repartee about mass homicide and organ donation, I came across as charming as always. Dodged another of your feeble bullets, zodiac. Accuracy: 0.

Thursday: "You can open doors that have been closed in the past."

Giving my horoscope one last chance, I made a concerted effort and decided to call a friend I hadn't spoken to in a while. In life, our paths often diverge, but "because my horoscope told me to" is as good a contrivance as any to rope someone back in.

Turns out she'd just been thinking about me. Eerie. A friend had given her some of my writing, and she'd actually read it. Ego stroke! Sure, her horoscope said nothing about needless, inconvenient phone calls, but she handled it all with patience and humor. Isn't that just like a Capricorn? Accuracy: 4.

I didn't need a test to prove that horoscopes are just speculation, but I was surprised to discover they do hold some practicality. It's like reading a vague journal entry hours before you actually live the day. Checking the script keeps you engaged. Taking the advice can push you outside your normal comfort zone. Perhaps best read, a horoscope is less a prophecy and more a friendly suggestion for the road ahead. Because having all the answers is no way to live. ✖✖✖

RULES OF THE RAILS

TO ALL PASSIVE-AGGRESSIVE MBTA riders: Every now and then, it's nice to go over basic coexistence rules, just so things don't get out of hand. Rule No. 1: When asked to share your seat, please slide your bag/pile of documents/butt towards the window instead of standing up and waiting for the stranger to slide into the inside seat. It is rude, it looks rude, and it will only cause you an uncomfortable trip since your new neighbor is probably cursing you (in thought). Rule No. 2: When choosing the escalator as a form of transportation, remember to stand to the right, walk on the left. It's simple, it saves time and missed trains. Finally, Rule No. 3: Pack up. Unfortunately, you're a commuter. Let's face the sad reality and move on. When the driver on the speaker says, "Move towards the end of the train, please," move towards the end of the train, please. There are more people like you trying to get home. Really, you're not the only one.

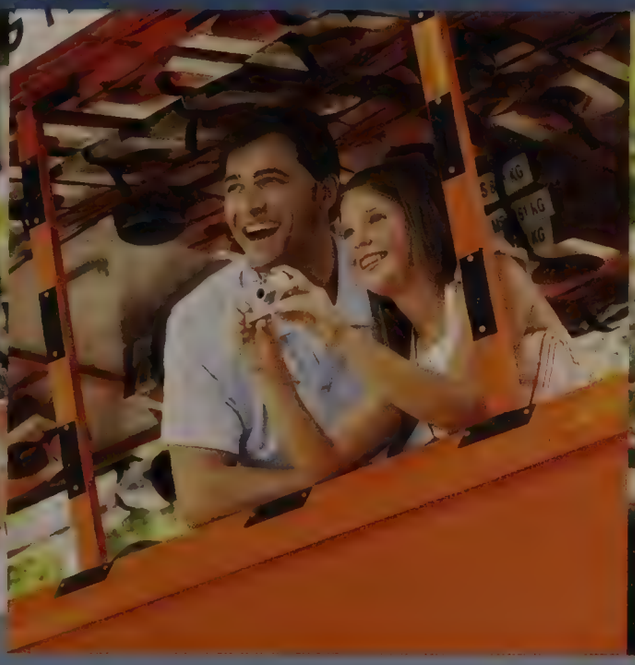
Hopelessly devoted to a happy commute

To the hungry construction workers on Stuart Street:

I know that it must be a difficult task to sit on the sidewalk on a hot summer day and stare at the pedestrians walking by, but really, gentlemen, how about we do it with a little class? I mean, if you want to check out every female ranging from age 50 to 5, then be my guest. But I promise you there will be no numbers exchanged or Friday night dinners over candlelight with that approach! Oh, and I really hope that's your food you're drooling over. So dust off your hard hat and take one piece of advice: Learn to smile. It works much better.

Future marriage counselor

Hey, you, Mother Nature:



I know it seemed an impossible task for you these past few weeks, but would you mind SOME form of sensible weather pattern? I get it's summer, so the 90+ degrees and humidity I'm prepared for. What I'm not prepared for? The downpour you decide to grace us with at the same time. Having to carry an umbrella in my bag every day out of paranoia of your every move isn't very fun, so cut me some slack. I'll take the schizo weeks of 90 and sunny, 75 and gray, 90 and sunny, 75 and gray. Just leave out the waterworks, and we'll be BFFs.

Where's the Butter?

If people find its nomenclature puzzling, it's only because most buttermilk on the market today lacks a key ingredient. Your average commercial carton contains (at least partially) skimmed milk inoculated with lactic-acid bacteria. Not so with Kate's Homemade Butter. The Maine company recently started bottling a version that runs right off the churning line. The resulting product proves its authenticity by leaving tiny, yellow flecks at the bottom of a measuring cup or, for diehards, a milk glass.

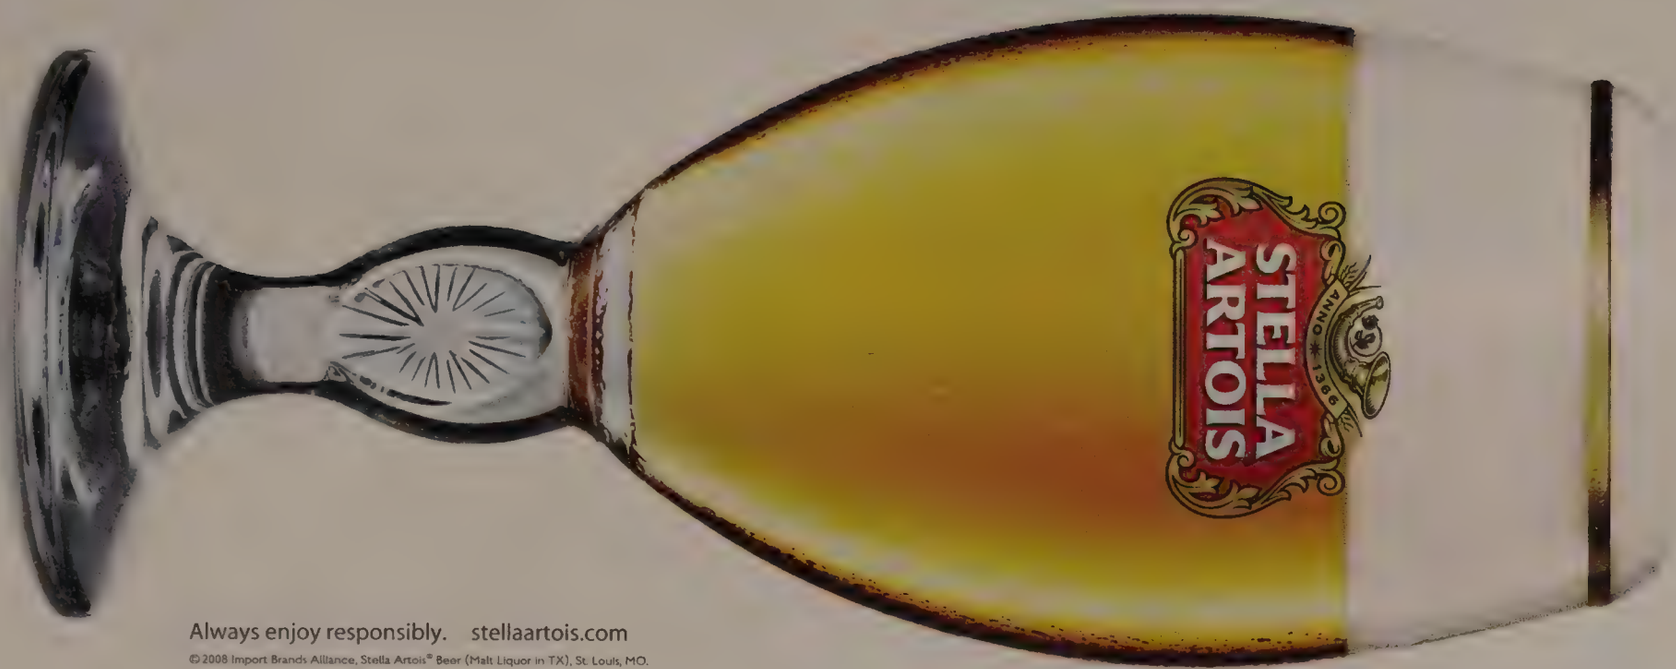
NO "OM" CLOSURE

When bankruptcy doesn't mean bye-bye

YOU MAY HAVE HEARD that Om in Harvard Square has filed for bankruptcy, and the landlord has started eviction proceedings, but what does that actually mean for diners?

Not much, according to owner Solomon Chowdhury. It's notoriously difficult to evict a private tenant in Massachusetts, but commercial leases generally provide less slack. Of course, terms of leases vary, and Chapter 11 bankruptcy provides some protection for the filer, so this landlord-tenant dispute will take a while to work its way through the courts.

Meanwhile, the bottom line is the status quo: "Business as usual at Om," Chowdhury insists.



ARE TAQUERIAS the new bagel shops? By the time you read this, Dorado Tacos & Cemitas, chef/owner Doug Organ's new place, should be open in Coolidge Corner. Also on the brink of doing business: Olecito in Brookline Village.

CUTE CONCEPT: an upcoming event featuring a walking dinner tour of restaurants in the neighborhood of Park Square, promoted as a Monopoly-esque "Park Place." On Sept. 2, for $50, players will follow a map that leads to courses at Davio's, Legal Sea Foods, Fleming's, Da Vinci and Via Matta.

Next in the series? Maybe "Operation" for the best eateries in and around local hospitals; "Candyland," featuring Chocolee, Aroa and Flour in the South End; and, unlikeliest of all, "Mousetrap," a tour of restaurants that have failed health inspections.

Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. stellaartois.com

SNACK ATTACK

Tory Row serves small bites in the heart of Harvard Square.

SAVORY FARE Rachel Klein samples snacks like bacon, white cheddar, onion and spinach flatbread.

WITHIN MINUTES OF arriving at Tory Row for dinner with Rachel Klein, the mothering chef had a bite of food in my mouth. "Taste this," she enthused, handing me a baguette smeared with a creamy spread. Klein had already ordered enough snacks and beverages to cover our corner table at the Harvard Square restaurant.

Tory Row—from the owners of Cambridge 1, Middlesex Lounge, Audubon Circle and Miracle of Science—does well with sharing. Carrying little resemblance to anything British or conservative (as the name implies), the gastropub has the group's signature, minimalist decor (wood, metal, slate, brick). Tall, gaping windows look out onto the bustling square, and our nearby seats made us feel like part of the action. The open, uncluttered room is a drastic change from the '70s-era diner that formerly occupied the space. Klein, who worked in Cambridge at Om before moving to Aura at the Seaport Hotel, was happy to return to her previous stomping ground. "I loved living here and being so close to [the restaurant]. But having a family, I really like being in Needham now," she said, pulling out her phone to show off a photo of her two-year-old son.

Having taken charge with the menu, Klein put together another bite for me. We were eating the Wasik curry-apricot cheese ($4), which she spread onto a slice of bread and sprinkled with salt. "It just needs a pinch," she said (a common refrain throughout the meal). The dish had a sweet, sultry flavor. Klein liked it so much, she took an order to go. We washed it down with the Fisherman's IPA ($5.50) and a glass of Terra Antiga Vinho Verde ($6). We also tried a bacon, white cheddar, onion and spinach flatbread ($10); again, it needed a hit of salt, but the bread itself was perfectly crisped.

Between mouthfuls, Klein talked about her role at Aura, where she runs the dining room and oversees all the food for the Seaport Hotel. "Before this, I'd worked in small, independent restaurants my whole career," she said. After leaving Om in 2007, she found the leap to an institution with 24-hour service and multiple menus challenging. "But the Seaport really is like a family, and I have so much support."

As one of a handful of successful female chefs in town, Klein has enjoyed getting to know peers like Lydia Shire and Barbara Lynch. All three juggle their culinary careers with motherhood. "I've really been inspired by both of them," Klein said, talking about one day opening her own place. The aesthetic, she added, gesturing to the room, "might even look something like this—minimal and sleek. I like the way this feels."

Not so minimal was the half-pound loaded cheeseburger ($10). A chef known for deconstructed dishes, Klein disassembled her half and put some curry-apricot spread on a bite of beef. "The whole point of the burger is the meat," she explained. "That's what I want to taste." Not totally sated, we continued our march through the menu with chèvre-stuffed peppadews ($4), an addictively peppery snack, as well as the baked raclette ($9), which came bubbling hot, like a flat fondue. We smothered it on slices of baguette, along with house-pickled shallots. Klein added a touch of mustard, which gave it a tangy kick.

Our after-dinner treat was watching the crowds in the square thin out on a breezy summer night. "Having a family definitely changed the way my career was going," Klein said, sipping a Tetley's cream ale ($5.50) in lieu of dessert. "But I wouldn't change anything. I'm in a really good place." ***

BLOOD SPORT

Am I a hero for helping the Red Cross? In a word, yes.

I ALWAYS HAVE AN EXCUSE not to give blood. I'm busy, or the donation place is too far away, or I just got bit by a mosquito that probably definitely carries equine encephalitis. So when the Red Cross sets up shop near my house, I look at my calendar for scheduling conflicts—an appointment to have my skis waxed before the winter rush, an Airwolf TV marathon, observance of Gary Coleman's birthday—and come up dry. For the first time in a while, I decide to give blood.

And by "a while," I mean "more than a decade." When the nurse plugs my information into the computer, it says that the last time I donated was in 1998. In fairness, I tried to give blood a few years ago, but that nurse was rather indelicate with the needle, in that she tried to shove it all the way through my arm, through the table underneath my arm, and into the foundation of the hospital. I may be exaggerating. But she did go straight through the vein, causing me to get all woozy and almost yak on her. She told me to come back and try again later. So I did. Just five or six years later.

A few things have changed since the happy-go-lucky blood drives of 1998. For instance, the iron test. I'm not worried about my iron level, because I eat plenty of iron, in the form of Total cereal and two-pound dumbbells. But the splatter shield makes me nervous.

As the nurse gets ready to prick my finger, she lowers something that looks like a transparent welder's mask over her face. "They make us wear the splatter shield these days," she says. Splatter shield? What, exactly, is about to happen here? I'm picturing a scene out of True Blood. Or Dexter. I guess I should just be glad she's not wearing water wings and climbing into a kayak.

After a decidedly non-splattery iron test, I sit down at a laptop to answer the questionnaire. At first, the questions are straightforward—sex, age, weight—but they get progressively more specific and bizarre. Eventually, brow furrowed in thought, I find myself pondering, "Have I paid a prostitute to punch me in the face in Britain since 1996?" Well, no. Not since 1996. "Follow-up: Do I have any friends named Gordon? Really? Well, that's interesting."

You wonder what they're getting at, the Red Cross. For instance, have you considered that vampires are real, and perhaps the Red Cross is run by vampires who use it to slake their boundless thirst for the sweet nectar of human life? That's not a question on the form, by the way. I'm just asking.

When I'm done, the nurse has a few more questions. She asks, "Are you of Hispanic descent?" but before I can answer, she cops a look at my jellyfish tan and mouths the word "nope." So much for my plan to infiltrate a Mexican drug cartel under the alias Ezuardo Macho.

And then it's off to the bloodletting. Given my last experience, I'm a little apprehensive. Back then, I was by myself in a hospital room; this time I'm on a church basketball court surrounded by people. I'm known around my neighborhood as a bit of a tough guy—kind of a stud, if you will—the guy that women want and men envy/fear/want. People say I'm like Bear Grylls, if he were a little more like Steve McQueen. So it'll definitely hurt my image if the nurse sticks me with a needle and my eyes roll back in my head, and I puke on the teenage girl giving blood one cot over.

Luckily, this nurse is a lot more skillful than the last one, and everything goes smoothly. I spend the rest of the day working my altruism into all my conversations. Heather asks what we should get for dinner, and I say, "Something that will help me rehydrate all that blood I gave." Dave at the gym asks how I'm doing, and I say, "Just doing cardio today on account of I gave blood." My accountant wants to know how I'm handling last year's SEP amendment, and I reply, "Well, I guess I gave blood because I like to help people. That's the kind of person I am."

By now, my blood is pumping through someone else's veins. Do I feel good about that? Sure, because helping out a stranger is its own reward. That, and the fact that the recipient becomes your minion. Now do my bidding, blood-minion! I command you! Ah ha ha ha ha ha!

I'm just kidding. Maybe. If you recently had a transfusion of A-positive that was followed by severe sun sensitivity and an inexplicable craving for chicken tikka masala, I have three words for you: You're welcome, minion. ✖✖✖

THE NEED FOR SHEED

Intensity, thy name is Rasheed Wallace.

WHAT DID YOU DO FOR vacation? The Celtics went on a family trip to Michigan and successfully recruited Boston's newest brother-in-arms. Sure this "brother" sometimes has trouble getting along with others, but we love him just the same. And at the end of the day, or season, we'll be back on those Duck Boats celebrating.

That's right. The C's will be champions again. Next year.

A bold prediction? Probably. Some will say the Celtics have sold their souls to the devil for banner No. 18. But they couldn't be more wrong.

I admit Rasheed Wallace's arrival in Boston is crazy stuff. It seems like only yesterday that Wallace was Public Enemy No. 1. Arguably one of the biggest whiners in pro basketball history (other than Celtics president Danny Ainge, of course), Sheed wasn't popular with Boston fans. But when we mention the word "championship," everything changes. He's now one of us.

The Celtics made their move for the 6' 11" Wallace, who plays the game like a monster. He's got long arms. He yells a lot. And those tattoos add to his miserable persona on the court.

But the reality is that Wallace is a great player. He's one of the best shooting big men, able to hit three-pointers from 30 feet away. You should watch his pre-game routine. He's a very good defender, especially off the ball. And his four All-Star selections and championship give him the cred you need to get respect in this league.

Sure, he's up there in years (34), but Boston is now the home for smart, veteran talents in all sports. We like them a little old around here.

Does Wallace have a temper? You bet your life. As he puts it, "Sometimes I go off." That's an understatement, but we understand why he does it. He cares, and the guy hates losing. But Kevin Garnett can tame that tiger.

I asked Sheed directly, "What is the over/under for technical fouls next season?" He was quick to point out that once he exceeds the maximum allowed by the league, which brings on a suspension, he loses the ability to count. Very funny.

A few years ago, the Celtics actually inquired about bringing Wallace to Boston. But that was a smart non-move. He wasn't a good fit then. We needed KG and Ray Allen around, two guys that command respect. But props to Ainge, who saw something he liked and finally nabbed his man. Despite insisting he wasn't keeping up with the Joneses, you look at the Lakers (Ron Artest), Magics (Vince Carter), Cavs (Shaquille O'Neal) and Spurs (Richard Jefferson), and realize the Celtics had to do something.

Wallace is notorious for not being media-friendly, though you wouldn't have known it seeing him with Garnett, Allen and Pierce on one side and Ainge and Doc Rivers on the other. With his daughter on his lap, he was charming and forthcoming. Of course, one Dan Shaughnessy column is all it'll take for hell to break loose—and the return of the one-word answers for which Sheed's famous.

Wallace's role appears to be a new one. He'll come off the bench, backing up both Kendrick Perkins and Garnett. That will be an adjustment. But his answer when asked about the probability of reduced playing time—"as long as I'm contributing"—was reassuring.

Wallace went on to say, "If I score a point and we win, hey, it's the sorriest point I've ever scored but we got the win. That beats 100 points and a loss any day." Another good answer.

That's not the Wallace I've been watching for the last decade, or is it? Did we judge a book by its intimidating cover? The Celtics claim that the perception of him as a malcontent couldn't be more off base. That might be true.

"Every day I try to envision it," he said. "If it goes the way I envision it, it's going to be a great summer next year." Even without Wallace, the Celtics were expected to compete for a title. With him, they have to be considered neck-and-neck with the Cavaliers as the Beast of the East. Hell, I think the C's might be better.

The key will be Wallace's temper. The Celtics now feature two of the most intense players the game has ever seen, Wallace and Garnett, so the new Garden will be a fierce, yet exciting, place. We'll find out if there's enough room on the court for so much intensity.

I can't wait. It's definitely going to be fun to watch. ✖✖✖

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON VMART, PAPI, VIN BAKER AND STARBURY

5 WAYS FOR THE SOX TO WIN THE DIVISION

All VMart, All the Time...
Terry Francona is the master of mixing and matching, controlling the clubhouse and keeping it copacetic, but the acquisition of Victor Martinez will test those skills. VMart must play every day, which means that every day Lowell, Ortiz or Varitek must sit out. How Tito plans to tiptoe around this potential upending of egos is beyond us, but as long as Martinez is batting third, we won't really care.

So Long, Smoltzy...
The John Smoltz Experiment had the makings of a legendary, feel-good story. "Down and out, future Hall of Famer overcomes the odds for one last moment of glory." Hell, Costner would've had it in theaters by Christmas. But, alas, much like 3000 Miles to Graceland, the JSE is a total disaster. It's time to shut down production.

Channel Their Inner Timlin...
Where would the Sox have been without Mike Timlin in 2004 or Hideki Okajima in 2007? The answer is nowhere. A reliable set-up man is almost as essential as a quality closer, and unless someone in the Boston bullpen (ideally Daniel Bard) can step up and put a stranglehold on the eighth, "nowhere" will be the final destination for the 2009 team.

Ride the Aces...
Josh Beckett and Jon Lester have been undeniably solid down the stretch, but given the state of this rotation, solid isn't going to cut it. From here on out, Beckett and Lester need to be stellar. They need to dominate. When one of them takes the mound, the Sox have to win. It's either that, or we start trusting Penny and Buchholz. So, yeah, domination is the only option.

We've Got an APB Out for One Jason Bay...
Listen, Jason, we can work this out. After all, the Sox really need your bat. And God knows you're still looking for that big payday, right? Right? So why don't you just come back, and we can forget this whole mess ever happened? There you go... that's it...

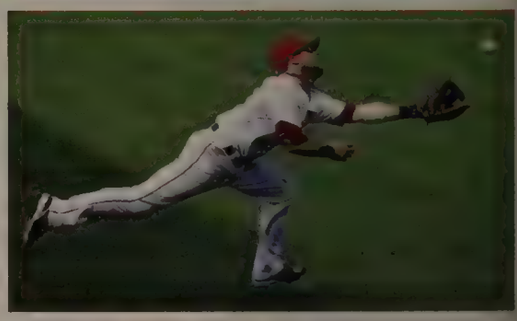
4 UNDERRATED CELTICS HOME GAMES

Dec. 20 Minnesota Timberwolves. Whenever the T-Wolves come to town, it's like a bizarre scene from The Family Man; it's a yearly, 48-minute glimpse into how things could've been. But unlike that Nic Cage clunker, this one's worth watching—especially since it also marks Ricky Rubio's potential Boston debut.

Jan. 22 Portland Trail Blazers. With a roster that includes a bona fide superstar (Brandon Roy), a potential All-Star (LaMarcus Aldridge) and a strong supporting cast, the Blazers will push the limits of Boston's home-court advantage. Note: Ignore the elderly 7-footer—the one with the walking boot and arm cast—at the end of Portland's bench. He's harmless.

Jan. 25 L.A. Clippers. It's hard to classify a visit from the No. 1 overall pick as "underrated," but when you're talking about the Clippers, all bets are off. Blake Griffin, Baron Davis and Marcus Camby give L.A. an entertaining nucleus. Plus, with Ricky Davis involved there's sure to be fireworks. Maybe literally.

March 31 OKC Thunder. By March 2010, Kevin Durant will indisputably rank among the top 10 players in the NBA. This is your only chance to watch him drop 30-plus points in a blow-out loss to Boston, so make it count.



1 NOTE ON DAVID ORTIZ

There's no doubt Ortiz used PEDs, but even more disappointing is that he—like every other outed 'roider—balked at the chance to gracefully and honestly accept responsibility. At this point, Papi's delayed response feels dirtier than him using in the first place.

2 UNSUBSTANTIATED RUMORS

She's Having a Brady... One of Gisele's photographers says she's pregnant. Tom swears she's not. We say, "Where there's smoke, there's fire, and this puppy's about to burst into flames." After all, don't forget the dad in question here. Brady's so potent, Dan Koppen recently went on birth control.

They Tried to Put Me in a BOX!... Should Stephon Marbury be committed? After watching his recent UStream marathon, you'd be crazy (intended) to think otherwise. But here's what we know for sure: You'll see Vin Baker stumble back into a Celtics uniform before you do Starbury. His career, like his mind, is officially off the rails.

3 Dates to Watch

8/13 The Pats are in Philly for Week 1 of the NFL preseason! (OK, calm down. That's quite enough.) The game also serves as a reunion of sorts, with Ellis Hobbs and Asante Samuel now playing for the Eagles, and Duane Starks currently working concessions at Lincoln Financial Field.

8/14 Clay Buchholz turns 25, which means he's only a year younger than Dustin Pedroia, the same age as Jon Lester and far too old to still qualify as a "bright young prospect."

8/21 The Little League World Series kicks off in Williamsport, Pa. This is like tax season for Pennsylvania's illegally doctored birth-certificate industry.

Soroff On ELI ROTH

The bad boy of horror movies talks about his sickest work, his best Halloween costume and his privates.

WILDLY SUCCESSFUL HORROR FILM AUTEUR ELI ROTH, a Newton native, transformed the genre with Hostel. Roth, 37, appears this month on the other side of the camera in friend Quentin Tarantino's movie Inglourious Basterds; he also directed a film-within-the-film. After graduating from Newton South, Roth attended NYU before moving to Hollywood. He cowrote Cabin Fever in 1995, which became his first box-office hit and the most profitable horror movie of 2003. But it was his second film, Hostel, which catapulted him into the top ranks of slasher directors. He's now an international celebrity, who has appeared on countless talk shows and even released a promotional photo dubbed "Eli Roth Has the Biggest Dick in Hollywood." He lives in Los Angeles.

Jonathan Soroff: So which side of the camera do you like better?

Eli Roth: Directing.

How does it feel to be on the other side?
It was great because I was being directed by Tarantino and doing scenes with Brad Pitt, Diane Kruger and BJ Novak, so it was fun. I'm used to being in charge, so it was a strange adjustment for me. But it was also an incredible education getting to watch Quentin work. Still, there's too much waiting around being an actor. You're also so emotionally exposed that it's an oddly humiliating and painful experience.

Who's a better kisser: Brad Pitt or Quentin Tarantino?
I will say this: Quentin's a big, snuggly guy, and when he grabs you in a bear hug, there's no getting out of it. Brad is much more gentle and sensitive. He almost made out with me at the press conference.

Angelina Jolie could probably kick your ass.
Yeah, definitely. But when I told her about it, she said, "Man, you shoulda gone for it!"

What do your parents think of your films?
Both my parents think it's a very healthy expression of a very normal child. I'm a nice Jewish boy.

Would you let your kids watch your movies?
Maybe when they're 40.

What scares you?
The thought that I might die without having sex with Heather Thomas.

Do you like going to the dentist?
I do. My dentist is great, and there's a really hot hygienist. She's so beautiful and has the most gorgeous eyes, so now, before I go, I eat a whole sleeve of Oreos, so I can just sit there and stare at her.

The sickest thing you ever thought of?
There was a moment in Hostel II when Heather Mattarazzo was hanging upside-down, naked, screaming for her mommy and crying, and it was just too real and too upsetting. I thought, "My God, what have I done?" But that's when I know I've hit it.

What kind of impact do you think you've had on tourism in Eastern Europe?
The same impact Borat had on Kazakhstan. I've talked to the people at Slovakia's tourism board about it. Seriously, guys would risk getting tortured to meet girls that hot, and the girls in Slovakia are that hot.

Best Halloween costume you ever had?
I thought my Edward Scissorhands was pretty good, 'cause I had long hair, but then the next year I went as Edward Penishands. I had actual, working penis hands, so that might take the cake.

You dislike the term "torture porn" to describe your movies. Why?
First of all, anyone discussing my work, I appreciate it. But that term is used by people who don't really understand the movies. Horror [flicks have] always been the bastard stepchild of the film industry, and they're treated like they're just one step up from pornography. So the fact that they took these two words that don't accurately describe the work and sort of discredit it, that's very dismissive.

Favorite horror movie of all time?
Obviously, the classics like The Shining and Evil Dead. But the one I watch over and over again and show to people is a Spanish film called Pieces from 1982. It's just a spectacular slasher film with a chain saw.

Your response to people who say that slasher films incite violence?
It's absurd. For over 300 years in Europe, people were tortured in horrible, horrible ways, much worse than anything in my movies, just because the Church ordered it. There are shootings at abortion clinics. So why not blame the Bible first?

Hardest thing to make look real in your movies?
People being terrified. Blood and guts, and all the effects... pretty much anything you want to do, you can. The thing that's tough is the look on someone's face of horror and fear, that they're really going to die. I think that in Hostel, that's what made it so scary. It requires great actors.

Who's the best horror film screamer of all time?
Personally, Carrie Henn, who played Newt in Aliens. That high-pitched, shrill scream. It's not the classic horror movie scream.

Favorite special effect?
Probably the alien bursting through John Hurt's chest in Alien. Now, of course, it looks like a puppet, but back then, it changed special effects.

Do you think people eat more or less popcorn at your movies?
The goal is to make them throw up. I think people have learned that my movies are diet movies. After you've seen them, you don't want to eat.

So it's a compliment when people admit you gave them nightmares?
Tremendous! People come up to me and say they were completely traumatized by the movie. That's the greatest compliment possible! Let's face it. It's hard to scare people. Audiences are pretty jaded. It's difficult to come up with stuff that's scarier than what's going on in real life.

Do you really have the biggest dick in Hollywood?
It's not like there's a Hollywood shower where you can compare. But let me put it this way: I have yet to get any complaints. And trust me, the girls that I'm talking about would complain. To your face.

Last question: Do you check for monsters underneath your bed every night?
No. I'm from Massachusetts. I keep a baseball bat under my bed. I tell my friends out here, "Do you know that in Boston more people use baseball bats off the field than on?" ××× Eighteen contestants. Four neighborhoods. Two buses. One badass scavenger hunt.

Get a CLUE

BY EZRA DYER / PHOTOGRAPHS BY MAX ESPOSITO, ROTHANY SRUN AND MEG WRIGHT

The problem with scavenger hunts is that, in order to be any good, they usually have to involve illegal activities. "Let's see, we need to find a state trooper's hat, an unregistered handgun and a prosthetic limb. Let's go!" In trying to devise a scavenger hunt that would test the participants' knowledge of Boston neighborhoods, I wasn't sure how far I could push the envelope before The Improper's vaunted legal team became involved. Sure, I'd love to have the cod from the State House mounted in my living room, but how many interns would have to go to jail for that to happen? Are three too many?

So I hit upon the idea of using digital cameras—a catch-and-release scavenger hunt, if you will. Traveling from neighborhood to neighborhood via the Bustonian, each team will have one official camera to record their kills, and the five clues in each neighborhood will be worth one to five points. The winning team will receive a prize commemorating its deep knowledge of the North End, Faneuil Hall, Beacon Hill and Southie. That prize: a Michael Jackson California Raisin figurine. What does that have to do with Boston, you ask? Well… it, uh… well. Dumb question.

We convene at The Improper HQ and divvy up the teams. With 18 contestants, each team will have five scavengers plus a photographer. The Gunt Thumpers enjoy an advantage, with all their members having lived in Boston for multiple years. Team Petit Chou mixes a couple of longtime residents with a few unseasoned interns. The Underdogs are all-intern, with the addition of two visiting Frenchmen—one of whom gave Team Petit Chou its name. Incidentally, having a Frenchman name a scavenger hunt team "little cabbage" is standard stuff for the Bustonian.

THE GUNT THUMPERS

FINANCIAL DISTRICT/ FANEUIL HALL

1. This place had queues for its cues before it became something new.
2. Hey! We need to point out that it smells kind of fishy outside this bar, at least on Fridays and Saturdays.
3. Jose, can you see where the block party is held each summer?
4. A tourist asks you where to find late-night sausages, an ATM and puddles of horse pee. You direct him to the corner outside this bar.
5. One was a dark, odd-toed ungulate. The other was a synonym for a liquid that boils at 212 degrees Fahrenheit. But when they got together, they combined to become something downright bazaar.

Our first stop is Faneuil Hall. This is the warmup, really, because all these clues are fairly easy. For instance: "One was a dark, odd-toed ungulate. The other was a synonym for a liquid that boils at 212 degrees Fahrenheit. But when they got together, they combined to become something downright bazaar." In other words, the Black Rhino and Aqua became Market. Since local expertise is partly predicated on knowledge of places that used to be something else, another clue hints at the former location of the Rack. Pretty straightforward stuff for everyone except the Underdogs, who return with photos of pretty much everything except the proper answers. The other two teams get all the answers. Clearly, it's time for some harder questions.

Map It Out...

All you need to replicate our scavenger hunt are four interns, seven other contestants, the Bustonian, a bus driver, a second Bustonian for when the first one breaks down/is sabotaged, three photographers and two visiting Frenchmen. May the biggest townie win.

BEACON HILL

1. As the fad for stainless-steel appliances swept the nation, this place was ahead of the trend with its stainless-steel toilets (at least, in the men's room).
2. It's something of an institution, but not of higher learning. Nor horticulture.
3. We know Beacon Hill is historic and all, but they really should get around to paving this street with something other than rocks.
4. Where valets and doormen stalk the grounds, there once was a buzzard named Buzzy who offered roast-beef sandwiches at wee hours.
5. This street, named after the benefactor of the Fourth fireworks, is a smashing place to park. And by smashing, we mean smash-and-grab.

The next stop is Beacon Hill. I decide to follow the Underdogs and see how they cope with their challenges. Amazingly, they solve the hardest question first: "This street, named after the benefactor of the Fourth fireworks, is a smashing place to park. And by smashing, we mean smash-and-grab." Now, if you Google this, you'll find that Liberty Mutual sponsors the fireworks. But for many years, they were paid for by David Mugar, who has a street named after him (unfortunately, a street hard against Storrow Drive, bordered by walls on both sides and hence an unsavory place to park). One of the contestants, Kristen, works at a restaurant frequented by Mugar, so she actually knows the answer. The Underdogs get their photo, along with a shot of the broken glass that litters the sidewalk there.

I return to the rally spot outside the Beacon Hill Pub to find our ride gone. Apparently, our first bus developed an oil pressure problem, so the driver went to swap it for another one. Was this subterfuge from a team that needed more time to find the stainless-steel toilets in a certain bar's men's rooms? Perhaps. But if so, it was misguided, because said toilets are just inside the doors to the Beacon Hill Pub. While we're waiting for the bus, the Underdogs return and photographer Rothany, accompanied by a male teammate, charges into the bathroom to get a picture. To the BHP's everlasting credit, the sight of a man and woman running into the bathroom with a giant camera raises nary an eyebrow.

TEAM PETIT CHOU

EZRA AND CASEY

MUGAR WAY

THE JUNCTION

When we finally reconvene, the results are unsurprising. The charmingly named Gunt Thumpers and the Petit Chous are tied for first, with the Underdogs a distant second. However, the Underdogs were the only team to figure out the five-point clue, Mugar Way.

NORTH END

1. One if by land, two if by sea.
2. It's not a crow's nest, but salty dogs can ward off scurvy with a screwdriver at this outdoor waterfront perch.
3. Chris Farley's last name in Tommy Boy, emblazoned over the passage east.
4. The site of one the biggest heists in Boston history, now it's a place to stash your getaway car.
5. This restaurant opened after a North End waiter won big on a scratch ticket—big enough to buy his own restaurant.

Casey is so out of Southie central casting that I expect the next words out of his mouth to be, "How you like them apples?"

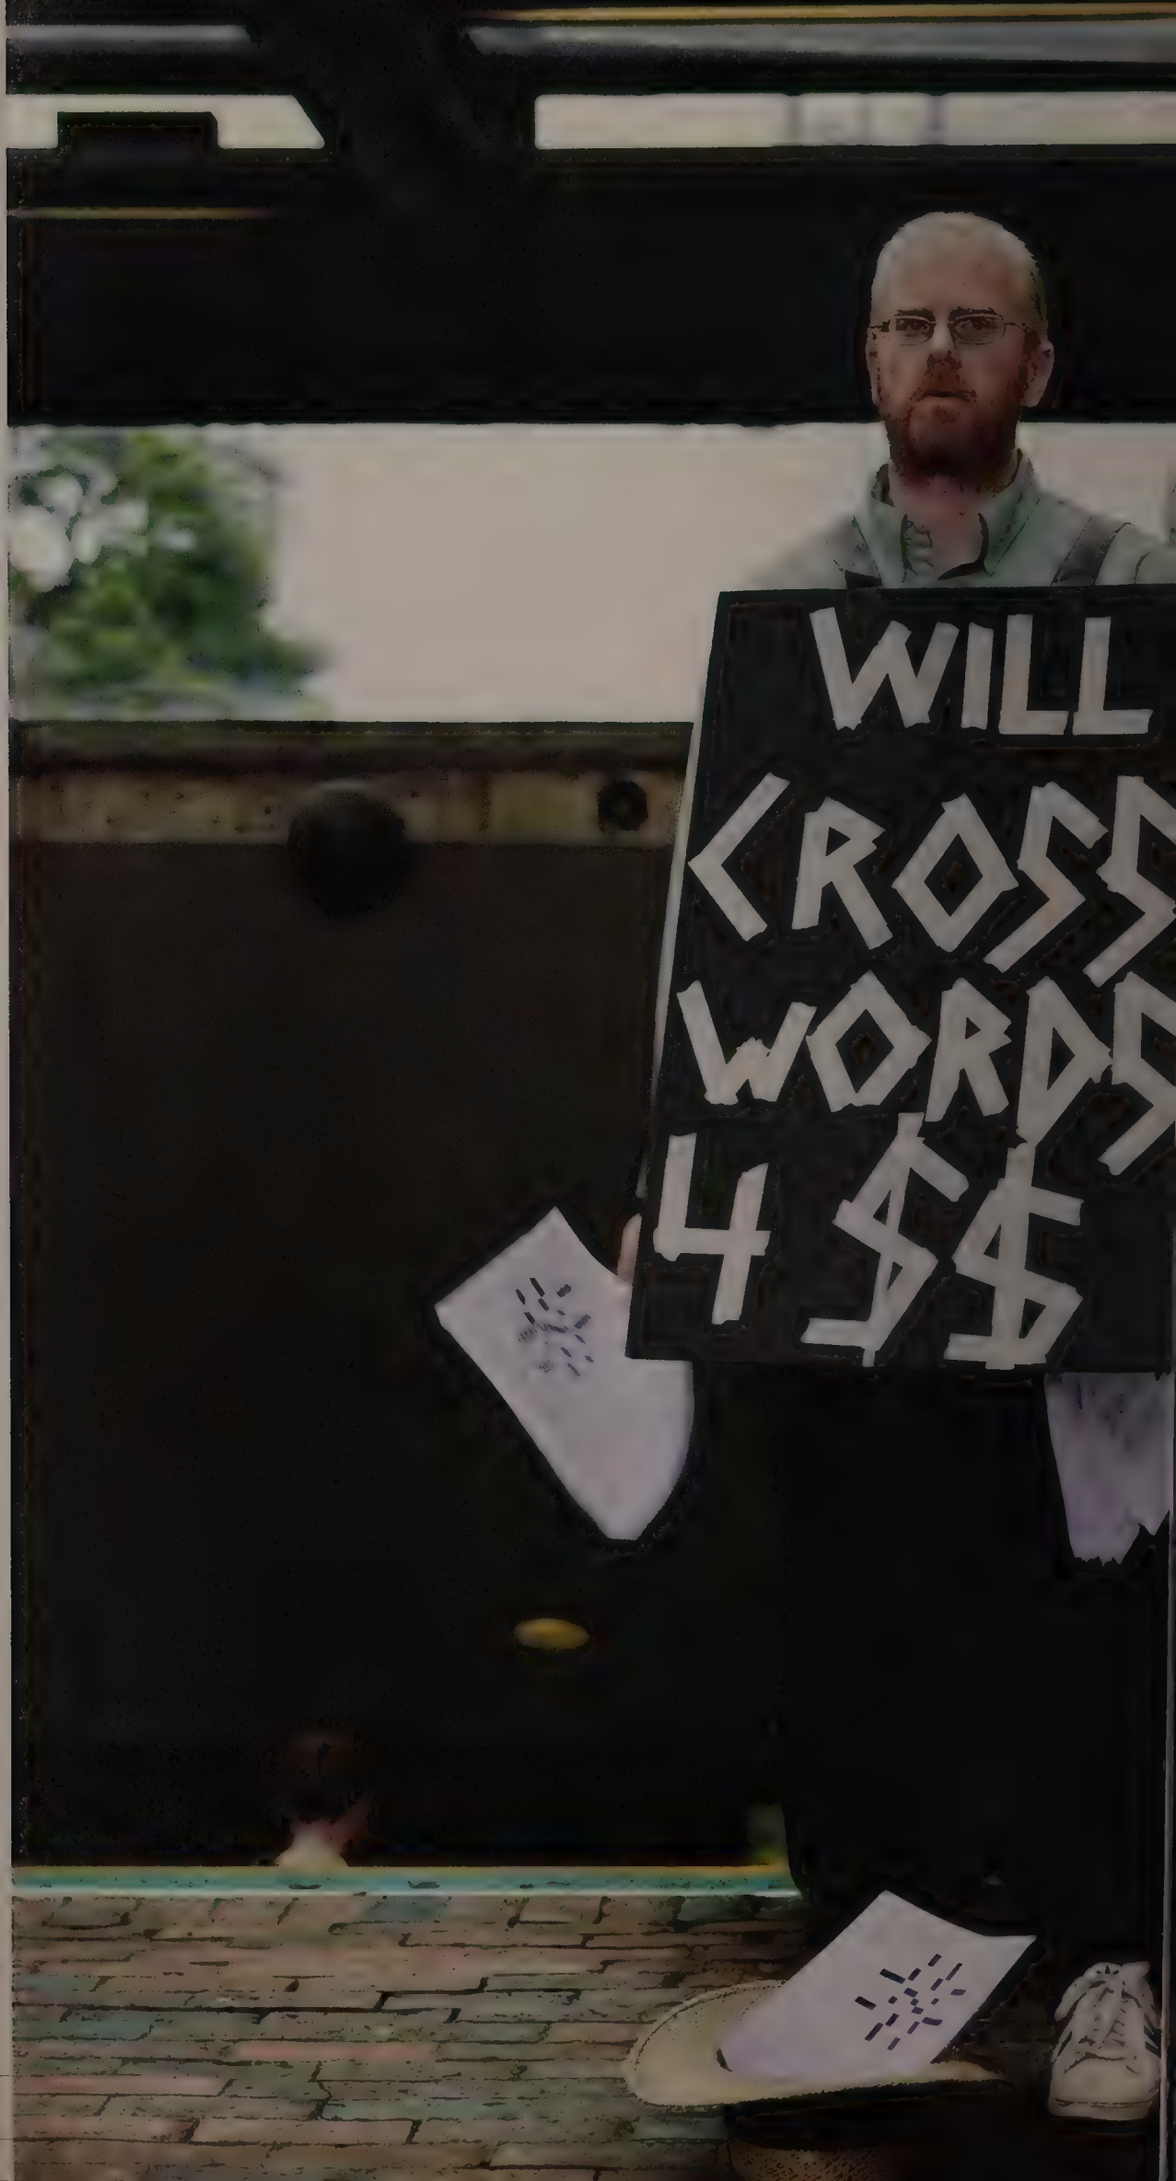
With a new bus, we're off to the North End. Here, at least one team arrives at a correct answer by consulting North End Google—which is to say, asking a guy who's sitting out on his stoop. The question concerned which restaurant was opened by a former waiter who won big money on a scratch ticket. Alyssa, of the Petit Chous, says of their source, "He ran inside, talked to someone, and came out and said 'Limoncello!'" Bostonians have a reputation for being standoffish, but in my experience, people love to help out and give directions. As it happens, Stoop Google also produced the answer to the location of the Old North Church, the easiest target on the list.

Like Faneuil Hall, the North End questions might've been a little bit easy, because the top two teams not only run the table, they have time left over to hit a bar. The scavenger hunt is devolving into a pub crawl, but that's in the spirit of the thing, as pub crawls can be an excellent way to learn about a neighborhood and all the wonderful little nooks where you can discreetly throw up.

SOUTHIE

1. There aren't any nautical vessels in here, but there are cups and cones.
2. The St. Patrick's Day parade turns left in front of this bakery, mmm'K?
3. The site of the old Jones department store no longer sells shamrock-emblazoned apparel, but it does offer quarter-pound Big Bites.
4. The outside of this place is green. Or black. Or blue. But you never seem to catch them painting it.
5. If you fancy a shag, you'll be able to look out the window and see this spot that's not a dog track but is still filled with Greyhounds.

The GTs and Petit Chou are tied heading into the final neighborhood: Southie. This one is probably the hardest, because casual visitors don't pass through Southie too often. To get these right, you kind of have to live there. Or at least, find someone who does.



Which Team Petit Chou does, right away. I'm observing the proceedings when I see our photographer Meg talking to a guy outside a 7-Eleven (one of the answers, actually, as it's the site of the old Jones department store). This fellow's name is Casey, and he has the word "Boston" tattooed up his forearm. He's also quite chatty. "Look at these girls, they're all hammered, running around looking for Blue's clues," he says. "What is this, Carmen Sandiego?" He turns to me and declares, "You look like a strung-out Peyton Manning." I tell him I get that a lot. He believes me, which is slightly disturbing.

While Casey is great entertainment, he's not really a great source of info. I'm shocked he doesn't at least know the bar that's always changing colors, the Junction. "Well, I'm from Dorchester," he says. Meg, for her part, is from Vermont, and as we walk away, Casey calls after her, "Hey, Vermont! I'm taking you out sometime!" Casey is so out of Southie central casting that I expect the next words out of his mouth to be, "How you like them apples?"

Meanwhile, the Underdogs appear, coming from the direction of the Junction. They're the only team to get that answer. Borana, an intern, says, "We talked to some 12-year-olds hanging out on the corner, and they knew where all the bars are." She adds, "We also talked to a guy with a Boston tattoo, and he hit on us." Of course he did.

At this point, the Gunt Thumpers and Petit Chous are standing on the corner of L and East Broadway, trying to determine the final answer—the Greyhound bus service garage across the street from Shag salon. They figure it out nearly simultaneously, so now it's a race to see who can take a picture and get back to the bus first. It's all tied up, so the contest comes down to this. While the Petit Chous walk in the direction of the target, the Gunt Thumpers send a runner stealthily jogging with the camera on the opposite side of the street. I wait for them by the bus, and in a few minutes the Gunt Thumpers return with their bounty—and the coveted Jackson-Raisin Cup, which will be passed around among team members for the next year, or until their title is challenged.

After about 10 minutes, there's still no sign of the other team, so I call my friend Whits, one of the Petit Chou leaders. In the background, I hear the signature cacophony of a bar. "We're in Murphy's Law," he says. "Did we win?" No, no you did not. And if I'm not mistaken, I can hear another voice emerge from the din, calling out the riddle that has stumped Southie scavenger hunters since the dawn of time: "Hey, Vermont, where's strung-out Peyton Manning?" ✖✖✖

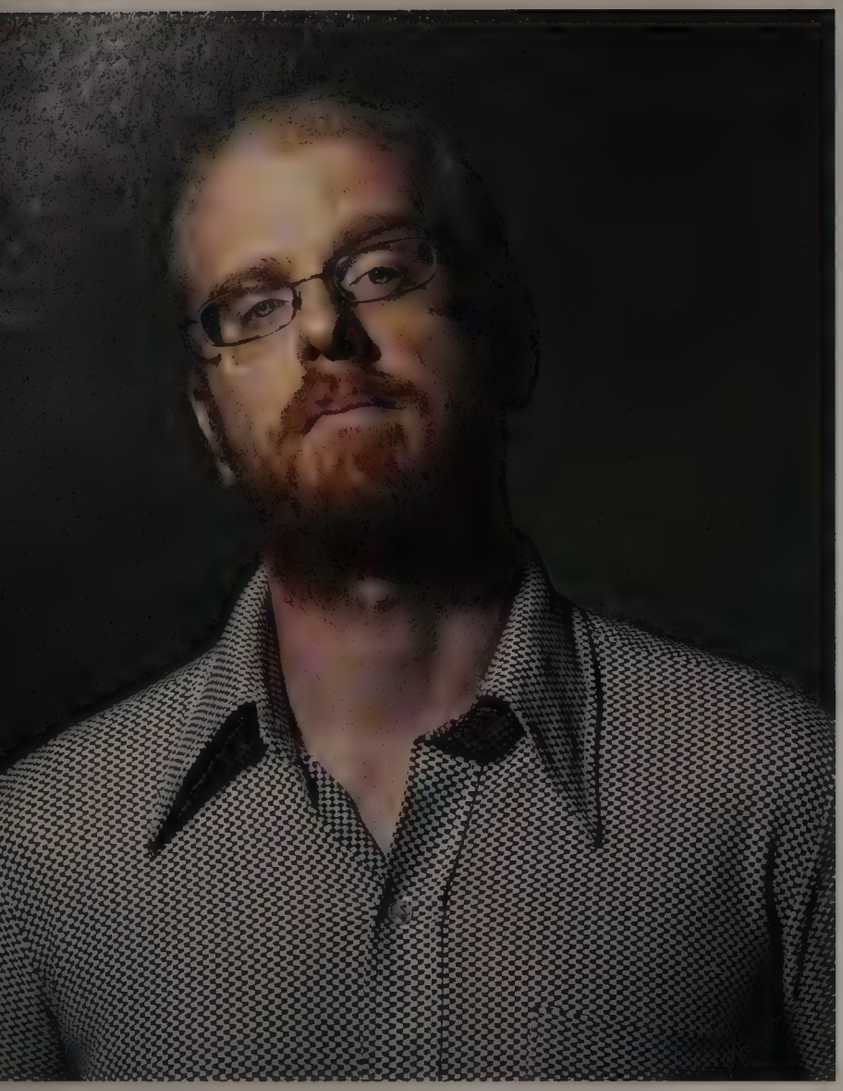
WELL CONSTRUCTED



Brendan Emmett Quigley builds a career as a puzzler.

BY JOHN DYER | PHOTOGRAPHS BY DARREN STAHLMAN

OVER A FEW PABST Blue Ribbons, I witness the depth of Brendan Emmett Quigley's obsession. My task is to interview the man-about-town who has produced around 120 crossword puzzles for The New York Times—the seventh-most in the newspaper's history—and authored numerous books full of the black-and-white grids. As the hours at the Silhouette Lounge in Allston pass and the empty beer cans pile up, it strikes me that crosswords aren't just a job for this guy. They're a road map for his everyday life, an existence where the logic of the puzzle dominates. "People hate vacuums," he says. "They like to fill things in. That's why the crossword is an eternal form."

A Cambridge resident, Quigley is a star in the subculture of constructors and solvers, terms insiders use to describe crossword-makers and the untold readers who spend their Sunday mornings scratching letters into tiny white boxes. The 35-year-old has appeared in books documenting the scene and recently launched a Web site (brendanemmettquigley.com) that promises to secure his status in the firmament of constructor stardom, a popularity he enjoys in large part because of the oddball allusions he brings to his grids.

"Brendan is famous for his up-to-dateness, for using more modern themes," says Will Shortz, editor of The New York Times' crossword section. Shortz lists some answers (or solutions, in insider parlance) to clues that appeared in a recent Quigley puzzle, all of which show how he constantly recycles his day-to-day existence in his constructing: Matt Drudge. "We're doomed."

Larry David. "Whatthe." Digerati. "That's great puzzle making," Shortz says.

Quigley's rise in the puzzle world smacks of kismet, as nothing in his background suggests he should be superhumanly adept at wordplay. Born in the suburbs of Chicago but raised in Norwood, where he graduated from the local high school in 1992, he was an admittedly mediocre English major at the University of New Hampshire. While still a student in 1995, he challenged himself to solve each day's puzzle in The New York Times. "It was a way to pass the time that became an unhealthy addiction," he describes. In 1996, to his surprise, a puzzle he constructed on a lark was accepted. The next three were rejected, but after that he was on a roll.

Today, Quigley admits his solutions are considered unusual in the relatively stodgy world of crosswords, where most solvers know more about Bach than Beck. But he maintains he's a traditionalist in most other ways. Indeed, the ironclad form of the grid is one of the attractions of constructing, he says. Once one accepts its limitations, the options—paradoxically—are endless. "I'm mostly making garden-variety crosswords," he explains, adding, "I hate saying garden variety, because that sort of degrades it."

His Web site, on the other hand, is undeniably shaking up the culture. Hardcore solvers need a fix of tough puzzles at a rate The Times—whose games grow more difficult as the week progresses—just can't provide. Quigley delivers and, in the process, writes a blog where his fans can discuss issues of the day. A recent post about The Atlantic Monthly dropping its crossword generated almost 100 exchanges in just a few hours. "No one else is doing this, putting up puzzles three times a week and an essay about crosswords and life," Shortz says.

The site is an example of Quigley's farsightedness and entrepreneurial spirit. He hopes he'll sell enough books, T-shirts and other items online to make up for the loss in income he expects to suffer when newspapers either further slash their budgets or disappear. It also gives him a venue for his massive output. Developing his craft since that first puzzle was published in 1996, Quigley has built a full-time freelance career where he creates scores of crosswords a week and sells them to newspapers ranging from The Times to The Wall Street Journal to The Onion, earning on average a few hundred bucks per puzzle. He also makes personalized grids for avid fans on special occasions, like birthdays—once taking home $5,000 on a single commission, he says. Other puzzles end up in books he's authored or to which he's contributed.

Quigley's obsessiveness comes into view when he describes plans for the site. Between sips of PBR, it becomes clear his hopes and dreams are wrapped up in his online venture. It's his chance to cut out the middleman, to be the lord of his domain. "I'm the [seventh-most] published crossword constructor in The New York Times, and I'm still hungry," he beams. Yet with ambition comes anxiety. Without the guiding hand of an editor, he wonders if his pop-culture references might become too obscure and alienate the new solvers he wants to reach. "I'm afraid I'm doing too much with this blog," he worries. "I'm afraid, at the end of the day, people will be afraid of it because the puzzles are too hard."

After the Silhouette, Quigley and I go to the basement of an East Boston house so I can get a glimpse of his other obsession: music. This particular evening is especially apropos, because it's a rehearsal of the Boston Typewriter Orchestra, a band whose members play nothing but antiquated office machines. For hours, Quigley, four other guys and a lone woman type away rhythmically at old Remingtons and other typewriters. The result is like a drum circle where a single beat emerges from what at first sounds like chaos. Finding a pattern, a thread of order, within a cacophony of tapping typewriter hammers seems perfect for someone who earns a living inventing connections between unrelated words. Quigley agrees. Both music and crosswords require a sense of parallel structures and consistency, he says. "This is all mathematical. It's a lot of ratios."

With song titles like "Entropy Begins at the Office," the BTO is as much a conceptual art collective as a band. But the players are serious; they practice hard and regularly perform gigs around town. Quigley's music bona fides also stem from his participation in Campaign for Real Time, a group that won WBCN's Rock & Roll Rumble in 2006.

Quigley's job, his typewriter tunes, his manner—"I don't really spend a lot of time on things I don't enjoy doing," he says—and mainstream-cool dress (leather jacket, T-shirt and jeans) indicate he's a cross between a hipster and a nerd, a perfectly respectable combination for a Cantabrigian. He's got a nervous energy and intensity, however, that can be slightly off-putting, especially if you think it's a bit unusual to contemplate crosswords all the time or to play songs on an Underwood.

Later, I ask Quigley's wife, Liz Donovan, to help me articulate her husband's personality. A 37-year-old Englishwoman from York who works as a psychologist, Donovan married Quigley last year. She'd known him long before they started dating, but eventually she was drawn to his infectious passion for music and constructing. If he has an anxious vibe, she says, it derives from his focus, which might be likened to an artist who has little time for distractions that might keep him from reaping his teeming imagination.

"He's very social," Donovan says. "But puzzles and music allow for a lot of autonomy. He's more interested in working that way instead of working for an over-controlling boss. He's managed to escape that entirely."

The BTO is in-between tunes when I tell Quigley I'm leaving. He looks up, takes a swig from a can of Miller High Life and, as I reach over the table full of typewriters, shakes my hand. The other orchestra members wave goodbye. Then they're back at it again. Quigley's head is down. He is staring intensely at his typewriter. As I let myself out, he's still striking the keys furiously, as if he were writing words in the air. ✖✖✖

Dressed to Impress

Duamarius Stukes is suited for success.

BY AMANDA KNORR | PHOTOGRAPHS BY BLAKE FITCH

Director of housing and assisted living at Boston's Executive Office of Elder Affairs, Duamarius Stukes moves in a world of charcoal, pinstripes and navy blue. But he's fine with that. Stukes, 38, would never categorize himself as "a jeans and T-shirt kind of guy," anyway. Even when he's not suited up for his government job, he doesn't dress down. Stukes keeps his look pulled together, no matter the occasion.

How would you describe your style?
Conservative flair. Preppy jazz.

Favorite places to shop:
Lord & Taylor, H&M and Zara.

What's the main difference between what you wear for work and for the weekend?
I have to wear a suit and tie [for work]. On the weekends, I definitely dress casually, so it's not as intense—I might wear jeans, shorts, blazers, sandals or sneakers, and hats.

Why do you stay away from the jeans and T-shirt look?
It's just not put together. It's not a real look, if you will. It's more something you would lounge around your house in.

How do you get your personality across in your work outfits?
I try to incorporate more colors. I'll wear a blue suit with a pink shirt and tie. And I like white collars—like a pinstripe shirt with a white collar. I like to add pocket squares to my blazers for color in the spring and summer.

So what are your favorite colors?
Royal blue, purple, pink, yellow and tan.

Any style icons?
Bill Bellamy, Fonzworth Bentley and Tom Cruise. P. Diddy [too], even though I kind of hate giving him props. But he is an icon in terms of fashion. He'll wear a black-and-white tuxedo, but he always adds a little flair. I do that, too. ✖✖✖

The Other Fab Four

Mafiosos, corrupt politicians, superficial housewives: New Jersey has given us so much. But we forget that our schadenfreude was once genuine affection. Sharing airwaves with the Beatles, Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons set a dreamy soundtrack to the Sixties. Jersey Boys, the musical that narrates the Garden State group's story, plays at the Citi Performing Arts Center's Schubert Theatre through Sept. 26. With direction from Des McAnuff, a Tony-Award–winner, Jersey's musical history is sure to come out looking strong. Although Massachusetts did give the world the New Kids, so there.

Angels & Demons ★ Are these Dan Brown books as stupid as the movies they've spawned? I guess you can call Angels & Demons a step up from 2006's unspeakably turgid The Da Vinci Code, if only because it's more frantic and unhinged than that burnished, lethargic yak-fest. This boondoggle begins with a time bomb full of anti-matter (yes, kids, "anti-matter") stashed somewhere in Vatican City, and things only get more preposterous from there. Late game developments in this picture provoked peals of laughter the likes of which I've seldom heard at comedies. I daresay it's Ron Howard's funniest film since Splash. Tom Hanks reprises his role as surly Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon, with his charisma tamped down flatter than his unfortunate hairstyle. He wanders around pointing at statues and mumbling obscure art history footnotes while everyone else marvels at his intellectual prowess. Howard cranks up the Gregorian chant and keeps the lighting dim and the mood glum, but the material's inherent silliness throws the ponderous self-seriousness into sharp comic relief. (In the suburbs.)

Away We Go ★ ½ This is my least favorite kind of movie: one in which nothing is learned from others and no common humanity is shared. There's just a succession of straw-man arguments for a sad worldview that's established in the beginning and remains unchallenged all the way to the end credits. Literary supercouple Dave Eggers and Vendela Vida make the case for their own moral and intellectual superiority by penning roles for John Krasinski and Maya Rudolph, who play two go-nowhere goofballs having a baby. They decide to travel the country to find parents to model themselves after, only to realize that—despite having nothing to say or precious little to offer—they're much better off than all the rest of the cartoonish losers. It's a noxious ode to generational entitlement, and I swear, if I ever see another "soulful" shot of a movie character staring blankly into the camera while twee acoustic guitar music plays on the soundtrack, I'm going to travel back in time and kill Zach Braff before Garden State ever happens. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Brüno ★ ½ Failing miserably at everything his surprise 2006 smash Borat accomplished so brilliantly, gonzo character-comic Sacha Baron Cohen inhabits a preening gay fashionista seeking fame in the tawdry cesspool of celebrity culture. As the title character, Cohen prances around in various states of undress, taunting unwitting rubes while invading their personal space, presumably making some sort of statement about homophobia. But where Borat was able to elicit some revelatory moments of truth from Cohen's targets, most folks in Brüno refuse to take the bait, politely excusing themselves and wishing the weirdo would just leave them alone. He can't even summon anything embarrassing from a bunch of rednecks on a hunting trip, which is like shooting at fish in a barrel and missing. Cohen resorts to transparently staged bits and self-congratulatory celebrity cameos. A comedian as gifted as Cohen should understand that you can't tell the same joke twice and expect people to laugh. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Cheri ★★ ½ There's a mini Dangerous Liaisons reunion going on in Stephen Frears' latest. The director gets back with acid-tongued scribe Christopher Hampton, here adapting another French bedroom saga for star Michelle Pfeiffer. But the past 21 years have taken their toll, as Pfeiffer now plays a sassy, brassy woman of a certain age. (You know you're getting old when Pfeiffer is getting Glenn Close roles.) Culled from two novels, Hampton's surprisingly slender script begins with Pfeiffer's aging courtesan Lea agreeing to babysit slatternly Kathy Bates' wayward, dissolute son, Cheri (Rupert Friend). It's obvious that these two are crazy for each other, but societal mores won't allow it, so one hastily arranged marriage later, we're watching Michelle Pfeiffer elegantly suffer her way through a belle époque riff on He's Just Not That Into You. Frears is savvy enough to toy with his front-loaded iconography, using cinematographer Darius Khondji's harsh natural lighting to turn this twisted farce into a meditation on Hollywood's horrific treatment of aging actresses. (In the suburbs.)

(500) Days of Summer ★★ ½ You can tell from the title's pointless parentheses—and the fact that the female lead is indeed regrettably named Summer—that this debut from music video

BON APPETIT

Julie & Julia
Starring Meryl Streep, Amy Adams, Stanley Tucci and Chris Messina. Based on the books Julie & Julia: My Year of Cooking Dangerously by Julie Powell and My Life in France by Julia Child with Alex Prud'homme. Written and directed by Nora Ephron. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

David Giesbrecht

PIGS ARE FLYING. HELL froze over. Nora Ephron made a charming film. Yep, she has achieved the seemingly impossible.

Architect of the modern romantic comedy, Ephron initially became famous for being cheated on by Washington Post writer Carl Bernstein. Somehow she parlayed her misfortune into a profitable career turning affable stars like Meg Ryan and Tom Hanks into annoying simpletons in such basic-cable staples as Sleepless in Seattle and You've Got Mail. Last glimpsed four years ago at the helm of the unwatchable Bewitched, Ephron had apparently retired to director Marc Webb has no shortage of the cutesy indie quirk that usually causes this critic to retch in his popcorn bag. But a funny thing happens on the way to Juno territory, as the film keeps alternating between twee, look-at-me set pieces and lacerating truths not often depicted in romantic comedies. Joseph Gordon-Levitt falls head-over-heels for wide-eyed Zooey Deschanel, and the screenplay by Scott Neustadter and Michael Weber shuffles their ill-fated courtship into jarring, haphazardly juxtaposed days of blissful puppy love, waning interest and abject misery. It's basically He's Just Not That Into You for boys—with half of the running time spent warning you about the dangers of over-idealizing your object of desire, and the other half settling for banal, sitcommy tropes like the wise-beyond-her-years kid sister. It's a shame the movie keeps sheepishly backing away from its sharpest insights. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Funny People ★★★ Rambling and self indulgent, super-producer Judd Apatow's third directorial effort finds the auteur of today's man-child comedy craze struggling mightily with his growing pains. An awkward though endlessly fascinating film, Funny People is the kind of deeply personal project you can only get away with once you've already banked a billion for your home studio. Adam Sandler turns in a self-lacerating performance as a sell-out star content to sleep with groupies and turn out crap flicks until diagnosed with a potentially fatal blood disease. Alone and miserable, he adopts Seth Rogen's struggling stand-up as a gag-writing lackey and torments the young comic while attempting to repair his own life before it's too late. It's a deeply hostile, uncomfortable picture that exposes the raw, competitive nerves that drive many comedians to ruin. Like most Apatow flicks, it's poorly directed and at least a half hour too long, but Funny People proves itself to be brave and uncompromising. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Hangover ★★★ This summer's out-of-nowhere blockbuster boasts a can't-miss premise: after a bachelor party gone wrong, three addled buddies wake up to a sea of Las Vegas sleaze, with no idea what happened to the groom. A bleary-eyed detective story follows, as these staggering malcontents attempt to piece together the previous evening. Director Todd Phillips, who helmed the similar man-child favorite Old School, still hasn't mastered the pacing required for such screwball comedy, but his cast comes to the rescue. The Office's Ed Helms once again uses his outward dorkiness to conceal a deep-seated anger, and star Bradley Cooper can't help but bring an unpleasant aggression to a character presumably intended to be much more endearing. The off-kilter energy is hammered home by alt-comedy icon Zach Galifianakis, who steals every scene not nailed down with his deadpan, wildly inappropriate reactions and perverted asides. The movie isn't always as funny as it likes to think it is, but this trio makes it feel dangerous. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince ★★ The previous Harry Potter film, 2007's rousing Order of the Phoenix, was a first for the Potterverse: a stripped down, focused humdinger a celebrity netherworld of Martha's Vineyard parties and Huffington Post editorials.

Or maybe she went to film school?

Not that Julie & Julia is any great shakes, but it's a breezy little bauble, coasting on the charisma of its stars and crafted with an attention to detail heretofore unseen in the Ephron oeuvre. Yes, it's a trifle, but one that's thematically coherent and a bit wiser than expected.

In early 2002, young Julie Powell (played by the ever-fetching Amy Adams) was on the brink of 30 and lost. Driven to tears daily by her job at a Lower Manhattan rebuilding project (with the chasm of Ground Zero lurking just outside the office window), the once-promising Amherst grad was a failed novelist at a career dead end.

But then Powell discovered these newfangled things called blogs. Finding solace in the kitchen, she decided to cook all 524 recipes in Julia Child's seminal Mastering the Art of French Cooking within a year and write about the results in daily missives on Salon.com.

Cooking and writing gave Powell a sense of purpose, not to mention a stalker-ish obsession with everyone's favorite TV chef. Ephron's script deftly skips back and forth between the two, contrasting Powell's misadventures in the kitchen with Child's early career in France, as she struggled to find her own path after retiring from the OSS.

> It's a warm, affectionate portrait full of clumsy, earthy humor.

Ephron's ace in the hole is Streep's predictably glorious performance as Child. Propped up on lifts and padded out to Child's imposing linebacker frame, Streep nimbly apes that famous warbling voice and bemused laugh as she clomps around the set like a delightful giantess. It's a warm, affectionate portrait full of clumsy, earthy humor.

Ephron and Streep also lend Child a giggly, randy edge that will be slightly disturbing for those of you who grew up on WGBH. She's always sneaking off for nooners with her doting husband, Paul (Stanley Tucci), and at one point lets rip a slang term for a rooster that cannot be reprinted here.

Hardly ridden with conflict, Julie & Julia doesn't have much at stake beyond Child occasionally butting heads with snooty Cordon Bleu execs and Powell struggling with aspic. Yet, in a way, the lack of incident is strangely refreshing, as the movie is really about finding something you love and doing it well.

Despite a couple bouts of blogger narcissism and a few prying questions from Senator Joe McCarthy about Paul, Ephron's film isn't particularly concerned with drumming up momentum. It merely invites us to watch these characters discover what they do best. I enjoyed seeing Adams' wide-eyed enthusiasm steel itself into newfound confidence, and every moment spent watching Streep's bull-in-a-China-shop movements is one to treasure.

Mention must also be made of Tucci's understated performance. This is a rare movie that portrays husbands as patient, supportive folk instead of misunderstanding boobs, and it's tough not to be touched by Paul gazing upwards at his wife in lovestruck adoration. He always looks at her like she's the most beautiful woman in the world, no matter how awkward it may appear when they're dancing.

Two hours is probably a little long for this sort of thing, but what the hell. Not every movie needs to be angsty or action-packed. My interest in the culinary arts stops at TV dinners and cold-cut sandwiches, but I enjoyed my time with these characters, and sometimes that's all you need to feel satisfied. ✖✖✖ that finally felt like one of JK Rowling's beloved tomes had been effectively re-imagined in cinematic terms. For once, this Muggle began to understand what all the fuss was about. Alas, it's back to business as usual at Hogwarts with returning screenwriter Steve Kloves (who penned the first four but sat out the most recent picture) again transcribing an aimless grab bag of moments that don't serve much purpose beyond offering fans of the series some pretty pictures to look at. Sumptuously shot by the great cinematographer Bruno Delbonnel, the film is devoted to long scenes of folks delivering grave passages of exposition. All setup and no payoff, Half-Blood Prince never feels like a movie in its own right, just a lot of logistical scaffolding required to set the stage for the final chapter. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Humpday ★★ An uneasy cross between Kevin Smith's crass Zack and Miri Make a Porno and Kelly Riechardt's lyrical Old Joy, writer/director Lynn Shelton's sophomore effort hangs on an provocative, albeit entirely unconvincing hook. Estranged college pals Joshua Leonard and Mark Duplass reunite after many years and drunkenly decide to make an amateur stag flick as "an art project" about "straight guys doing it." Leonard's drifting, bearded hipster models himself after Kerouac, supposedly a sharp contrast to Duplass' buttoned-up, married suburbanite. Alas, it's established early and often that Leonard is hardly the swinging free spirit he likes to imagine he is, and Duplass is far more complex than his white picket fence and boring day job might suggest. Shelton falls into repeat mode fairly quickly, with characters awkwardly blurting out the story's subtext every 10 minutes or so. The will-they-or-won't-they tension is a foregone conclusion, and Shelton already explored the diverging paths of former friends to less gimmicky and more amusing ends in her debut film, My Effortless Brilliance. (At Kendall Square.)

The Hurt Locker ★★★★ Director Kathryn Bigelow delivers an exercise in pure craftsmanship, and perhaps, not coincidentally, the first Iraq War movie worth a damn. This pulse-pounding excursion to the front lines eschews political hand-wringing or sermonizing in favor of following an explosive disposal crew, dismantling deathtraps with a surfeit of rotten luck and sick gallows humor. Jeremy Renner delivers a ferocious, star-making performance as Staff Sergeant James, an adrenaline junkie so heroically spectacular at his job, it hardly matters that the rest of his life is a disaster. A succession of jaw-dropping suspense set-pieces, the first hour of The Hurt Locker initially stakes a claim as one of the greatest war movies ever made. Eventually it settles for merely being one of the best films of the year, as Bigelow and screenwriter Mark Boal take a detour to probe James' peculiar psychopathology, with results that are rewarding, though less visceral in their impact. It's a cruel, bitter and brilliantly assembled picture. (At Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and Waltham Embassy.)

In the Loop ★★★ ½ In director Armando Iannucci's scabrous Iraq War satire, a misfit band of lackeys bump up against heavyweight players on the eve of the invasion—a delicate time in which even an inconsequential sound bite can blossom into a media phenomenon. Supremely savvy in regard to the power of words within our media, In the Loop drops a numbskull British Cabinet member (Tom Hollander) into the weeds of an international debate, with his every vacuous utterance spun and repurposed by forces on both sides of the argument. Peter Capaldi's shadowy political fixer fulminates with exquisitely potty-mouthed rage, eventually meeting his match in James Gandolfini's Colin Powell clone. The two square off in an aria of schoolyard insults so epic I actually applauded. Visually inert but aurally astounding, the movie plays recent tragedy for cynical farce. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Public Enemies ★★★★ Form becomes content in Michael Mann's audacious take on the final days of John Dillinger, a bank-robbing cowboy adrift in a modern world. Johnny Depp tones down his usual theatrics to play the master thief as a man just out of prison who's living for no future or no past, just an extremely precarious present. Shooting in trembling, hi-def digital video with mostly handheld cameras, Mann upends the traditional grammar of a gangster period piece and avoids the expected establishing shots of lavish 1930s art decoration in favor of nerve-jangling close-ups and experimental editing techniques. The deliberately alienating style doesn't just mirror the immediacy of Dillinger's moment-to-moment existence, it also makes explicit his bafflement at this shimmering new landscape, where both J. Edgar Hoover's Bureau of Investigation and Frank Nitti's mafia goons employ technological wonders that render an old-school desperado like our hero obsolete. Love it or hate it, Mann's technique is some sort of breakthrough. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Star Trek ★★★ ½ What a wonderful surprise. It takes serious gall to recast characters as iconic as Captain Kirk and Mr. Spock with fresh-faced barely-knowns. Sure, there's a shiny coat of CGI paint and everybody's impossibly good-looking, but director JJ Abrams has captured the upbeat sense of adventure that defined

Gene Roddenberry's original 1960s' series. More so than any Trek project in decades, this one captures the camaraderie, the easy humor and, most important, the swagger that we associate with the headstrong Kirk and his logical, pointy-eared pal. Much like Casino Royale, Abrams' Star Trek finds ingenious ways to serve up familiar pleasures. Rare for a landscape dominated by dour popcorn blockbusters, this one isn't afraid to be fun. All the phaser battles, sexy green girls and transporter beam antics you'd expect are present, just with slightly unexpected spins. The film's rousing finale ends with the Enterprise crew at last assembled and warping off to what we can only hope will be a happy series of sequels. May they live long and prosper. (At Simons IMAX and in the suburbs.)

Summer Hours ★★★ ½ French writer/director Olivier Assayas often suffers from a pedantic streak a mile wide. But this quiet, devastating family drama plays to his strengths, with three squabbling siblings sorting out what to do with their late mother's estate. Playing the heartsick eldest, Charles Berling attempts to keep the family's posh country compound intact as a refuge for future generations, while younger Juliette Binoche and Jeremie Renier just want to cash in and move on with their cosmopolitan lives. Assayas pays as much attention to the objects in the frame as he does to these characters, as he lavishes furniture or the artwork on the walls with symbolic importance. Saying a lot, but never out loud, the film allows the dispersal and auction of these material things to stand in for the dissolution of a family over time. (In the suburbs.)

The Taking of Pelham 123 ★★ Director Tony Scott's pointless remake of Joseph Sargent's 1974 classic keeps the basic premise, as a scenery-chewing John Travolta hijacks a Manhattan subway car, much to the chagrin of Denzel Washington's weary, everyman dispatcher. But this slick redux misplaces the attitude, which is everything. The original wasn't much of a nail-biter but still remains a cherished cult favorite thanks to its time-capsule vision of a crumbling, battle-weary New York City. Scott's hyperactive version employs web cams, Wi-Fi gadgets, freeze frames and swooping helicopter shots of overwrought car crashes to oversell a story that was already foolproof. Only James Gandolfini, playing a disgraced mayor waiting out the end of his term, musters a level of droll cynicism that matches the previous picture. (In the suburbs.)

Transformers: Revenge of the Fallen NO STARS Michael Bay has outdone himself and made a movie bigger, louder, longer and dumber than the godforsaken original Transformers. Again, there's no sense of joy or whimsy, nothing but the pulverizing fetishization of militaristic, alpha-male privilege. All women are spray-tanned skanks dressed like strippers, and every minority is a grotesque, ineffectual cartoon. An early set-piece is devoted to savoring the destruction of a library. Then we meet "Amos 'n' Android"—comic-relief robots modeled on monkeys who speak jive and flash gold teeth. (Bay's big punch line is that they can't read!) Eventually, even President Obama gets dragged into this mess, here ridiculed for attempting diplomacy with gigantic killer robots. Luckily, our heroes know better, so when a bespectacled, articulate representative of the new administration argues for transparency and accountability, the good guys promptly throw him out of a plane and go save the world by invading a Middle Eastern country. There's also a robot with enormous wrecking balls dangling from his crotch that serve as destructive testicles. This is what you asked for, America. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Up ★★★★ The geniuses at Pixar Animation Studios have done it again. This tall tale of an aging widower (voiced by Ed Asner) flying his house to South America with helium balloons has no right to be so emotionally powerful, but writer/director Pete Docter weighs down the bizarre flights of fancy with sharp human sadness. Somehow the movie manages to include a 13-foot female bird named Kevin, an army of talking dogs and some spectacular action sequences while never losing sight of the moving human drama. Breathtakingly animated, Up has more strange and beautiful images than can possibly be listed here, but perhaps none more so than the crumbling old home, born aloft by thousands of brilliantly colored balloons. It's a ridiculous conceit that pays off rich metaphorical dividends, as our protagonist must learn that it's time to let go. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Whatever Works ★★ ½ So there's this older, balding Jewish guy with glasses. Kind of a nebbish, he's obsessed with death, hates people and spends most days walking around his beloved New York City suffering panic attacks while obsessing about the intellectual degen-

Story Time

As You Wish

There are few things more timeless than a good old-fashioned fairy tale—even when they do have all that yucky kissing stuff. The Coolidge Corner Theatre screens The Princess Bride on Aug.17, a witty adventure story about the kidnapped Princess Buttercup and her childhood love Westley, who journeys to rescue her from the evil Prince Humperdinck. An oversized strongman (the late Andre the Giant), an accomplished swashbuckler with a vendetta, and a kvetching miracle man and his lovely wife help him along the way. It would be inconceivable to miss it. Max Gelber eration of the human race and the meaninglessness of our existence. By all standards physically unattractive, he still manages to spew so many brilliant one-liners that he scores the carnal affections of a hot, up-and-coming actress who happens to be a fraction of his age. Have you figured out that we're in a Woody Allen movie yet? Whatever Works, which is, by my count, Allen's 39th stint as a writer/director, has nothing new to offer. It's stagey, half-baked and overly reliant on lazy caricatures and cheap zingers. But I'd be lying if I said it doesn't have its fair share of laughs. Credit most of them to star Larry David, whose sandpaper delivery lends a refreshing edge of aggression to extremely familiar territory. (At Waltham Embassy.) plays the Regattabar Aug. 20.

DEEPER LAYERS

Spencer Day's smooth jazz-pop belies his strange journey.

AS A MORMON-RAISED singer/pianist whose urbane jazz-pop echoes the Great American Songbook, Spencer Day might be the last guy you'd expect to run off to Burning Man. Yet the Nevada desert festival, which embraces radical self-expression, became a source of fascination for the Utah native when he moved to Los Angeles a decade ago.

"A lot of ex-Mormons, when they're let out of the fence, go a little crazy," says Day, 30. "But I'm probably going to go to Burning Man this year. I haven't in quite a few."

If he does, it'll fall between his Aug. 20 date at the Regattabar and the Sept. 8 release of his aptly titled third CD Vagabond, which establishes Day as a confident songwriter as well as performer.

He was neither as a 2003 finalist on the CBS show Star Search, mixing standards with a Norah Jones number. "I was doing it as a lark," says Day, who had begun performing in public only a few years earlier at age 21. "I was so nervous. I'd never played anything but a few retirement homes and dive bars, and I'm on national TV!"

That experience—and a short-lived development deal with Universal Records—put too much pressure on him, he says, especially in the wake of ballyhooed crooner Michael Bublé.

In the process, he had to resolve issues with stage fright. "Somehow, going through that period and getting dropped by the label, it was like I emerged from the ashes," Day says from San Francisco, where he'd just played three nights at Yoshi's Jazz Club. "I just love performing now."

Day says he needed to develop his own material in addition to doing standards. "I still incorporate them in my show, but unless I can think of a unique perspective to bring them, I'd rather not touch them," he says. "Once you get that crooner label, it can be really tough, especially when you're an artist who wants to grow and expand on what you do. For a songwriter, there's more allowance to follow your bliss and go lots of different places."

> "Once you get that crooner label, it can be really tough."

Day has done that on Vagabond, a polished outing on the Concord Jazz label that subtly blends styles and tempos, showcasing him as a dulcet-voiced baritone. In tune with its title, the disc follows the theme of uncertainty that comes from moving on, both physically and emotionally.

You might sense a bit of Day in "Joe," whose family doubts his chances in California, or the anxiety-ridden character in "Tuesday Morning (Maybe)" who mulls whether he'll be a "big success" or a "big mess." And "Little Soldier" draws on Day's memories of going off to kindergarten, though some fans relate the song to their loved ones in the military.

"If you can have lyrics be a little opaque, it's great, because people can find themselves in them," he says.

Day's world has surely grown since his childhood singing hymns in East Layton, Utah. "We grew up in a very religious town," he says. "The video store only carried G-rated movies, so from an early age, it was either Disney movies or MGM musicals—and Mormons love their musicals! They share so much in common with gay people. For their love of musicals, if nothing else, they should come together."

After finishing high school in rural Arizona (where his music-teacher mother moved the family after a divorce), Day settled in California as a budding fan of rockers Radiohead and Tori Amos, just when he began to make his own music.

"My early songs were very confessional. They were like seven minutes long," Day says. "I was playing for an older audience at the Plush Room in San Francisco where I'd be doing 'All the Things You Are' by Jerome Kern, and all of a sudden I'd bust into a dark, Tori Amos-y rant."

Those shows didn't go over too well. "People said, 'He's talented, but why won't he shut up and do some standards?'" Day recalls. "I wanted to say, 'I'm more than what you think.'"

The key was finding his own voice, Day claims, and realizing that he didn't need to sound like the edgy acts he enjoyed. "That's the freedom of your 30s: You kind of know who you are," he observes. "Quiet is the new loud. That's my goal, to have something that on the surface can be tranquil and beautiful but still have some depth underneath." ✖✖✖

Boys of Summer

Pull Together With more than a decade of touring under its collective belt, O.A.R. (Of a Revolution) returns to Boston for two nights of inspired reggae beats edged with improv rock. Appropriately hailing from Rockville, Md., the group is famed for its live shows and anything-goes attitude in the tradition of Phish and Dispatch. Now on its This Town tour, O.A.R. will riff on hits like "Crazy Game of Poker" and "Love and Memories," as well as on tracks from its sixth studio album, All Sides. Joining the band at Bank of America Pavilion Aug. 13–14 is pop-folk singer/songwriter Brett Dennen.

Let There Be Light

Living on the Edge

Around Labor Day, a mass exodus of boogie-board–toting families clogs up the Bourne and Sagamore bridges, reluctantly bidding their summer playground good-bye. Most tourists know the Cape only for its busy shores and coastal motels. But year-round residents are privy to a different, secluded beauty that appears in the remote dunes and tidal flats of the seaside haven's wilderness areas. Photographer Larry Pratt's images, including "Hill Dancers," capture the landscapes of "the Edge," as he calls it. Pratt's work and 49 other winning pictures are on display through Aug. 30 in the Griffin Museum's Main Gallery as a part of its 15th Juried Exhibition.

Conjuring a Winner

Magically Ambitious At a time when anything Harry Potter–esque seems destined for a swift profit, a wizardly novel doesn't guarantee a good read. Thankfully, renowned critic and Lexington native Lev Grossman offers a worthy alternative for those still mourning Potter's end. The Magicians follows Quentin Coldwater, a young man who finds himself admitted to a secret school for magic—in upstate New York. In addition to evil necromancy, Coldwater has to deal with booze, sex and love. You know, real problems. Grossman presents his novel on Aug. 13 at Borders Downtown Crossing and the Boston Public Library. Borana Greku

ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER LOUNGING RINGSIDE AT THE ELMALI OIL WRESTLING FESTIVAL, HELD AUG. 14–16 IN ELMALI, TURKEY.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Mohammed Reza and Emily Ackman felt a little uneasy about posing with this tiger in Thailand... even more so when the monk flashed them his butterfly tramp stamp.

Beth and Joan McLaughlin spent their summer vacation in tropical Kazakhstan. Their only regret was arriving a day later than expected and missing the Running of the Tourists.

While in Texas, Katie Schylander made a pit stop at the Alamo. Sadly, the rumor that her stolen bike was hidden in the basement proved false.

Dave McLaren and Gia Peralta took time out from white-water rafting in San Jose to visit the Teatro Nacional de Costa Rica. That's Spanish for the Teatro Nacional of Costa Rica.

Located street level below the Shops at Prudential Center, Haru serves inventive Japanese cuisine ranging from sushi, sashimi and creative salads to signature dishes like ceviches, tartares, filet mignon and specialty rolls. The 6,100 sq. ft. space boasts a striking private dining room, elegant sushi bar, and lively bar and lounge scene perfect for people-watching. Catering and delivery also available.

L'ANDANA [86 Cambridge Street, Burlington, 781-270-0100, www.landanagrill.com] L'Andana will transport you to the foothills of Tuscany. The restaurant spins the rustic look of an old world farmhouse into a modern interpretation of the faraway countryside. Chef Jamie Mammano and Executive Chef Robert Jean work together to create cuisine that is equally fresh, authentic and contemporary Italian as well as featuring a selection of items from a wood grill. Full bar, extensive wine list, complimentary valet parking, and a striking private dining room are welcome amenities. Dinner Sunday-Saturday.

MASA RESTAURANT [439 Tremont Street, Boston, 617-338-8884 and 350 Cambridge Road, Woburn, 781-938-8886, www.masarestaurant.com] Masa's two locations offer an award winning menu, pairing flavors of the Southwest with local ingredients. Our $1 tapas in the bar and brunch and dinner menu feature great food at reasonable prices. Masa Woburn is open for lunch while Masa Boston has added our Picaditas, featuring small plates such as Green Chile Cheeseburgers. Our dining areas are the ideal spot to celebrate any occasion for any size group.

MATCH [94 Massachusetts Ave., at Newbury Street, Boston, 617-247-9922] This modern restaurant/ lounge maintains an unpretentious yet hip vibe. A sleek fire display and glass wine room are just two of its many features. Match's signature mini burgers and martinis are guaranteed to please the most discriminating palate. Match music has a distinct early evening lounge feel with the beat and volume picking up as the night progresses. Open daily 5 p.m.-1 a.m. AE, DC, MC,V.

MAX AND DYLANS [15 West Street, Downtown Crossing, Boston, 617-423-3600; 1 Chelsea Street, City Square, Charlestown, 617-242-7400, www.maxandylans.com] Max and Dylans is a hip, trendy, casual and approachable local restaurant featuring appetizers, flatbreads, sandwiches and entrees. Cool and vibrant cocktails and hip, current music will add to the flare. Large, seductive black and white photographs decorate the restaurant. The menu is priced for value and makes it a great meeting place for groups or just a few friends. The City Square location has a private dining room that can hold functions of up to 100.

MISTRAL [223 Columbus Ave, Boston, 617-867-9300, www.mistralbistro.com] Located in Boston's stylish South End, Mistral features the award winning French Mediterranean cuisine of Chef/Owner Jamie Mammano. The dining room's high ceilings and arched floor to ceiling windows encircle the candlelit room and evoke a warm feeling of casual sophistication. Le Salon du Mistral, Mistral's private dining room provides an intimate setting for gatherings of 60 seated and up to 80 for a cocktail reception. Dinner Sunday-Saturday. Complimentary car service available in metro Boston.

The delectable Pink Lady Roll at Samurai Boston

ROGGIE'S NEW AGE BREW & GRILLE [356 Chestnut Hill Avenue, Cleveland Circle, Brighton, 617-566-1880, www.roggies.com] This all time favorite restaurant and bar has over 52 beers on tap. Come enjoy breakfast all day, lunch, and dinner. Extensive menu ranging from sandwiches, ribs, pizza, to pasta. Catering also available as well as party platters, call 617-713-0555.

SAMURAI BOSTON [827 Boylston Street, Boston, 617-236-7672. www.samurai-boston.com] From the toro to the Pink Lady maki, every bite melts in your mouth. Samurai Boston offers innovative rolls and martinis that are a nice change for those bored with traditional styles, but don't worry if someone in your party isn't a raw fish fan, Samurai Boston offers an extensive menu of Korean and Japanese cuisine. Located in the Back Bay, across the street from the entrance to the Prudential, Samurai Boston is open daily for lunch and dinner.

SCOLLAY SQUARE [21 Beacon Street, Boston, 617-742-4900, www.scollaysquare.com] Scollay Square is warm and inviting, featuring American comfort food and a sophisticated cocktail list at reasonable prices. A neighborhood bistro-style restaurant, we are a great meeting place for friends to eat, drink and socialize. New chef Jason Stump creates mouth watering daily specials, just introduced for the 2009 season. The menu also features a 3 course menu, served nightly, for $22.00. Join us weekdays for lunch, all week for dinner and Sundays for brunch and our famous "Make Your Own Bloody Mary Bar."

SORELLINA [One Huntington Avenue, Boston, 617-412-4600, www.sorellinaboston.com] Chef/Owner Jamie Mammano and Executive Chef Robert Jean prepare contemporary regional Italian/Mediterranean food in this sophisticated setting in Copley Square. Matching the creative cuisine is a warm-modern design highlighted by a glowing mural and expansive floor-to-ceiling windows. Settle into soft leather upholstery and enjoy the finely-crafted room that's welcoming, comfortable and elegant. Dinner Sunday-Saturday. Complimentary car service available in metro Boston.

SUNSET GRILL & TAP [130 Brighton Ave., Allston, 617-254-1331] SUNSET CANTINA [916 Commonwealth Ave., Boston, 617-731-8646] Don't just come for Boston's Best Beer Selection featuring 112 taps and 300 microbrews. Come also to enjoy Boston's award winning steam beer burgers and famous curly fries, original buffalo wings and giant nachos. Still hungry? Try our juicy BBQ steak tips, grilled fish, homemade pastas, tender Yankee ribs or our sizzling fajitas. Full menu until 1 a.m.

TAVERN ON THE WATER [Pier 6, Charlestown Navy Yard, 617-242-8040, www.tavernonthewater.com] Tavern on the Water is known for its summer days but is open year round. It has free parking all winter long; the view is the same and features special menu items during the winter months. Yes they even have tablecloths and all glassware during the winter. How about a bottle of Cakebread Chard for only $$65.00? When the warm weather hits it is the place to be with its outside 200 seat patio facing the Boston skyline.

TEATRO [177 Tremont Street, Boston, 617-778-6841, www.teatroboston.com] A leading player in downtown's

Theatre District, Teatro offers Executive Chef Robert Jean's take on rustic Italian cuisine. The restaurant recalls lavish stage productions and high drama with its stunning arched mosaic ceiling and marble inlaid walls. The triumphant curtain call -- a riveting open kitchen. Enjoy pre- and post-show cocktails, plus your star turn for dinner Tuesday through Sunday evenings. (Closed Monday).

Last Scene Here { JONATHAN SOROFF }

Yo, Ho, Ho...

Blue blazers and khakis? Check.

Lily Pulitzer? Check.

A good band, a lavish buffet and a serious view of the skyline from the waterfront in Charlestown? Check, check and check.

No, it wasn't the wedding of someone named Muffy. It was The Courageous Sailing Center's annual Make-A-Mark gala, which had all that and more (including a killer silent auction), and which drew the likes of leggy brunette Kim Richards, new dad Gregg Nourjian, mover and shaker Dave McLaughlin, power chick Jonilee Rossi, the fetching Amie Guerra, former Bostonian Rene Keilhauer and his Guatemalan princess, Paulina, financial titan Robert White, and one campy old queen who did his best Mae West impression and said, when asked by a volunteer if he would sponsor an inner-city kid in learning how to sail: "Definitely! I need to buy a sailor!"

However, the choicest exchange took place between a man who arrived at the party and immediately began complaining about having a Band-Aid on his thumb.

"I can't button a goddamn thing," he said.

"Can you drink rum and work your zipper?" his friend asked.

"Yes," he answered.

"Then quit bitching, and let's go get a drink."

Vive, La République!

Could there be anything more appropriate than a Bastille Day party at a former jail? Emphatically, non, which is why the French Consulate and The French Library Alliance Française threw a libertine bash on July 14 at the Liberty Hotel.

The égalité and fraternité, not to mention insobriety, began with a VIP reception on the vaguely Parisian patio (minus all the dog doo), where the official defile down the Champs Élysées was broadcast on a giant screen. The festivities continued inside, at the hotel's restaurants and throughout the lobby's three levels, featuring an art exhibit, a chick dressed up like Marie Antoinette (who turned heads among the clueless) and some good old-fashioned French exhibitionism (you know who you are).

Among the Francophiles, Francophones and those who love them were dashing diplomat Alexis Berthier, the improbably tall Eric Jausseran, Our Lady of Chanel Mary Nobile-King, the supersuave Cedric Tonello, Napoleonic developer Dick Friedman, antiquaire Marc Glasberg (note the French spelling of his name), French gallerist Suzanne King, Latina fashionista Laura Hernandez, comme il faut designer Denise Hajjar, the ubiquitous Mary Kakas, et père, et fils, et pretty much everyone else who enjoys a good party.

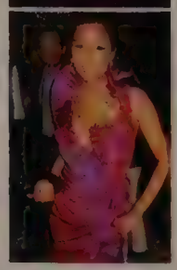
Having just gotten back from France myself, I actually had something to say, although "You wouldn't believe how much the French loved Michael Jackson!" turned out to be a conversational non-starter. And despite the tepid reviews by people who wouldn't have been satisfied by anything short of an angry mob actually storming a prison (aka some jaded French expats), it was a thoroughly enjoyable evening. In fact, the only thing missing was Madame Defarge knitting frantically. I just hope the chick dressed up as Marie Antoinette got to eat some cake.



We Have a Winner!

For our "Who Wore it Better" contest, we had white-hot dress designer and whirling dervish Sam Mendoza pitted against PR twinky Justin Mills of the Achilles Project. They wore an identical sweater by Shipley and Halmos (which not coincidentally, the Achilles Project carried), and the favorite turned out to be Mendoza, who will receive an Improper Bostonian T-shirt (which we expect to see him wearing). Sorry, Justin.

▲Winner!

For "Guess That Rack," the winner was yoga goddess Jasmine Punzalan, who was the first to identify the décolletage in the photo here as belonging to her friend Tonya Chen Mezrich, jewelry designer and wife of best-selling author Ben. Yes, the necklace is one of her designs, and yes, it would look good on a chest other than hers. So Jasmine gets an Improper Bostonian T-shirt, which she should consider asking Sam Mendoza to make into a dress. ✖✖✖

Clothing Cues

First secret: I watch So You Think You Can Dance. Second secret: Beyond feeding my former fly-girl fantasies, I really like the host, Cat Deeley—or more specifically, her daring sense of style. But when she wore a sequined dress with shoulder pads in a summer episode, my stomach dropped like a ballerina with a wardrobe malfunction. The next morning, I rushed straight to Ruth Basloe, Improper's fashion editor.

"Pads are everywhere," she responded. My own shoulders slumped. I'd rather not revisit the '80s. "Not to worry," Ruth assured me. "You can do a softer version." She grabbed a red Dolce & Gabbana jacket from a rack in her office. It had beautiful, billowing sleeves. The piece is just one of her picks for fall. The trends, including polished plaid, origami pleats and luxe leather, feel as appealing as Deeley on a good day.

Ruth's feature with cover guy John Slattery was less chic. Slattery, who plays an ad exec on AMC's Man Men, traded his retro suits for rugged wear. Born and raised in Boston, he spent the shoot (trash) talking sports with the photographer. It made him the perfect fit for laid-back looks like torn Levi's and a white Henley. Moral of the story: You can't go wrong with jeans and a T-shirt. No secret there.

Blog Heaven

INTELLIGENT DESIGN

AS A BOY IN Groton, Eric Gaskins used to sit in his bedroom and pore over fashion magazines, imagining himself transported to a world of "mystery and excitement." So he became a designer, and a very successful one, with his creations sweeping across red carpets, Vanity Fair covers, and the bosoms of actresses like Sharon Stone and Salma Hayek. Then, last month, Gaskins closed his studio doors, a victim of both the recession and the world he once pined to join. He still airs this disillusionment on the caustic, but very popular, fashion blog called The Emperor's Old Clothes.

"It's not about style anymore," says Gaskins, 51. "It's about status and labels and clothes that ape the original." This sums up his view of what's wrong with today's industry, a view he trumpets under his blogger's identity of Fluff Chance (his "porn name" taken from a childhood cat and the street where he grew up in Groton).

Fashion has "been processed to entertain people," says Gaskins, who apprenticed under Givenchy in Paris before starting his own studio in the '80s. "It's pablum for the masses. And to appeal to the masses you have to make it easily digestible."

The loss of art, of swapping fit for label, showroom for celebrity, is Gaskins' chief lament. But his writing isn't all invective. He still swoons over his favorite subjects, sounding much like the starstruck boy awed by the gloss and glamour of a magazine spread. On Christian Lacroix's fall collection, he recently blogged, "I came away with an aching heart."

ANDREW RIMAS

Drink of the Moment

Two New Stars in the Cosmos

When drawing up a cocktail menu, the Met Club's Leo Neves knew he wanted to combine drinks from the past and present. In keeping with the craze, Neves selected classics—lusty, full-bodied drinks from the era when elbow grease was part of the mixology. And he whipped up new creations in the belief that "cocktails being made by bartenders around town today will be classics 20, 30 years from now." But who could have predicted that a Cosmopolitan would fall in both classes?

The Blood Orange Cosmo ($11) is a newbie, a tart blend of orange vodka, triple sec, blood orange juice and sour mix that fits the chick-drink stereotype—it casts such a bright, sweet spell that three of them will disappear before you know what happened. (Doesn't seem very ladylike.)

The classic is the Original 1926 Cosmopolitan, a ruby-hued mix of gin, lemon juice, raspberry simple syrup and orange zest. It's a drink with heft and a fruit-forward palate, quickly cut with a gin zing and a bitter finish. Like the Blood and Sand, its color may raise a macho eyebrow but passes muster once it hits the mouth.

The Met's version could help shed the Cosmo's sexist stigma. "One guy who comes in only drinks Cosmos," Neves reassures. And is he ordering a glass of the ballsier vintage? "No, 'cause he likes them for the quantity." NICK ALTSCHULLER

Good Eats

Brilliant Bolognese

Chef Dante de Magistris guesses he's eaten barrels of Bolognese in Boston alone, but in both Bologna and his kitchen at il Casale, tradition dictates just one technique. After cooking ground pork, beef and veal, he sautes mirepoix (carrots, celery and onions) in the rendered fat, adding red wine and house-made tomato paste (1,000 pounds of vine-ripe produce due in later this month). De Magistris then tosses in chicken livers, mortadella and fatback for richness, deglazing the velvety ragù five times with a tri-meat and Parmesan-rind brodo before saucing his fresh tagliatelle ribbons. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Project Runway

Crimson Couture

If that Harvard rejection letter still has you down, don't despair. You might not make the Ivy League, but your clothes can still boast its stamp of approval. That's because our country's most hoity-toity institution has licensed its name to the Verus Group for a menswear line inspired by early-1960s collegiate fashion. Just imagine how proud your parents will be when they see you in Harvard Yard's sockless loafers, tapered shorts and a jaunty jacket. Jeffrey Wolf, executive vice president of Verus' parent company, Wearwolf Group Ltd, is still enticing stores to carry the line, but he expects it to hit retailers in the spring. Income from the license goes to fund undergraduate financial aid. Ranging in price from $165 to $495, the threads are cheap compared to tuition.

Wine

Setting the Tablas

Tablas Creek deserves greater recognition. Everything the California estate winery does, it does right: organic farming, low-yield harvesting, native-yeast artisan winemaking. A partnership between famed Chateauneuf-du-Pape producer Château de Beaucastel and its longtime U.S. importer Bob Haas, Tablas Creek has impeccable bloodlines. As most of its vines approach 15 years of age, they come closer to maturity. Try the 2007 red if you want a truly monumental, richly spicy, chocolate and blackberry-laced wine, which Haas considers the best he's ever made. For those on a tighter budget, the following are real beauties.

Tablas Creek, Côte de Tablas Red, Paso Robles, 2006 ($26, Marty's, Newton) This lush, concentrated wine has a gorgeous aroma of raspberries, herbs and underbrush. Its dark-cherry flavors and round texture are balanced by a core of earthy tannins. An ideal full-bodied blend, this red can take a very light chill. It has a lingering peppery finish. Great with barbecued ribs or steak tips.

Master of Wine Sandy Block is vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods.

Tablas Creek, Côte de Tablas Blanc, Paso Robles, 2007 ($25, Bauer Wine and Spirits, Boston) Flying counter to the trend of crisp, delicate and fruit-driven Rhône-style whites, this low-acid, fuller-bodied wine behaves more like a red. An aroma of earth and sautéed apples complements a buttery mouth feel. Its white-pepper minerality would pair well with fish or chicken in a creamy sauce.

Going Out

LIFE ON THE LEDGE

"We want to be the anchor for the neighborhood," Francis Pezzolanella says. "We want to give people everything they're looking for without leaving the neighborhood, but bring it to the level where people in the city have to come here." It's the kind of diplomatic statement you'd expect from a restaurant's general manager. But appealingly, at other moments, Pezzolanella sounds like a 29-year-old with a bar. "To put it in the words of the philosopher T-Pain, 'We're going to make it rain.'"

A multifaceted persona should help a venue aiming to draw all crowds. The diversity continues in the kitchen, where Steve Brady, a man who has spent years at high-volume chains, seems eager to deliver the full brunt of his bottled creativity. Where possible, items are local and sustainable, as expected these days, but Ledge also makes things like ketchup and mustard from scratch. There are the standard burgers, steaks and flatbreads but also sensory blips on the menu like braised short-rib arancini in a 10-hour organic coffee pan-sauce ($9). Accompanying the food is an extensive beer selection and a wine list that, in the words of Pezzolanella, "would hurt your parent's feelings."

In an effort to be all things to all people, Ledge is a blank slate, with space for 144 dressed in restrained wood, white and rock—a look that has septuagenarians peering through the windows and less inhibited locals saddling up before the official opening. "He said, 'I'm going to tell you this once, if I come back again, and you're not open, I will not be back,'" Pezzolanella recalls. Now in business, the eatery aims to keep both the eager and the ornery happy at the big stone bar. "We can't take it for granite," he says, with no discernible grimace. "We're just one quip after another."

Beauty

SEEING RED

Red lips rocked the fall runways—from Charlotte Ronson's deep burgundy to Zac Posen's crimson and coral. Ever versatile, the staple shade has its risks (think circus clown). "The most important thing to take into consideration when choosing a red lipstick is skin tone," says makeup artist Claudia Moriel of Make Up For Ever. Done right, it "creates the perfect glamorous look in the most dynamic, simple way." KRISTEN CICCOLINI

Light Skin
Try true reds with a blue base, no hint of orange or pink.

Medium Skin
Both blue- or orange-based reds work, but shades with an orange base pop the most.

Dark Skin
Shades with a purple or brown base are the most flattering.

CHILD OF MINE

On fertility, family and love

FACED WITH FERTILITY issues, corporate climber Jenny Callahan needs a sperm donor. Briskly, she picks onetime boyfriend Neil Banks as the "dad" for the job. Neil's a brilliant but rather dark-spirited man, who's fallen temporarily off his upwardly-mobile path. Theoretically, he's not to be involved. But a kind of weary curiosity brings him into the edges of Jenny's world and into their former college crowd. Neil finds himself romancing old-friend Laura, now a married mother.

Lost-guy-style, he's also seduced by Galena, a frighteningly sharky woman. She works with Jenny, marketing a slick postpartum antidepressant whose ad trumpets the message that "you deserve" to be happy. This revolts Neil, whose half-cynical, half-philosophical outlook favors the virtues of some emotional rain. Other old friends, two gay women with twins from Donor #176, provide a cozy subplot.

Minute by minute, from within, author Jessica Shattuck vividly inhabits the varying viewpoints of her characters and their dilemmas, while simultaneously delivering a subtle sting of commentary and criticism. Neil's anguished outskirt-fatherhood comes up against the shiny candy of Jenny's life, but even that tarnishes when her husband gets sick. Illuminated by Shattuck's sophisticated voice, the characters feel excitingly real. ✖✖✖

THE HUMAN STAIN

TO THE FORGIVING GENTLEMAN AT VIGA:

I'm a recent Boston transplant, having lived in the suburbs for many years, and it has been quite a shift from the daily pleasantries at the local mom-and-pop [shops] to the rushed, minimal personal interaction at the local Starbucks. While picking up my favorite combo meal from the corner sandwich shop, the overwhelming lunch crowd prompted me to drop my salad dressing in my haste. In the process, it spilled on your nice pants as you stood in line behind me. Instead of rolling your eyes or giving me attitude, you reassured me that I was not to worry, and you even—gasp—smiled. It's refreshing to see that some people are still aware that manners and kindness need not be spared for the sake of the city. Thank you for making my otherwise stressful day more pleasant.

Small-town girl

To the man in the "wifebeater" shirt:

As I enjoyed the weather on the Common, I looked up from my iPod and saw you staring straight at me and smacking your lips together loudly, saying, "Mmm, mmmm, mmmmm."

Man, good thing I have a boyfriend because I don't know how I could have contained myself otherwise. What a charming way to let me know I'm just a piece of meat. The only meat you'll be having is from Taco Bell because you'll never get a filet mignon like me with that approach!

Sincerely, Disgusted

To the customer afraid of fried foods:

Sometimes people take the phrase "the customer is always right" to a whole new level of absolutely wrong. Sure, it's an understandable request to see if you can get an order of food pan-fried instead of boiled in artery-clogging transfats. But it's another to berate my fellow bartenders who are simply relaying the message from the kitchen that they can't do what you (so angrily) want. That crosses the line from honest request to being a giant… well, fill in the blank on your own. Here's a tip: Maybe your health issues are triggered by your anger issues. Not vegetable oil. Think about it.

Donut on the DL

Though Boston's a donut town, malasadas can be scarce. Just as I prepared to trek to New Bedford or Fall River, where Brazilian and Portuguese eateries dot almost every corner, these treats turned up in a lone Somerville store. But don't look for them with the rest of the breads and pastries at Cross St. Market and Deli. The egg-enriched dough is deep-fried and dredged with granulated sugar out back, so it appears only by request in a swatch of waxed paper—and after 10:30 am on weekends. ELIZABETH BOMZE

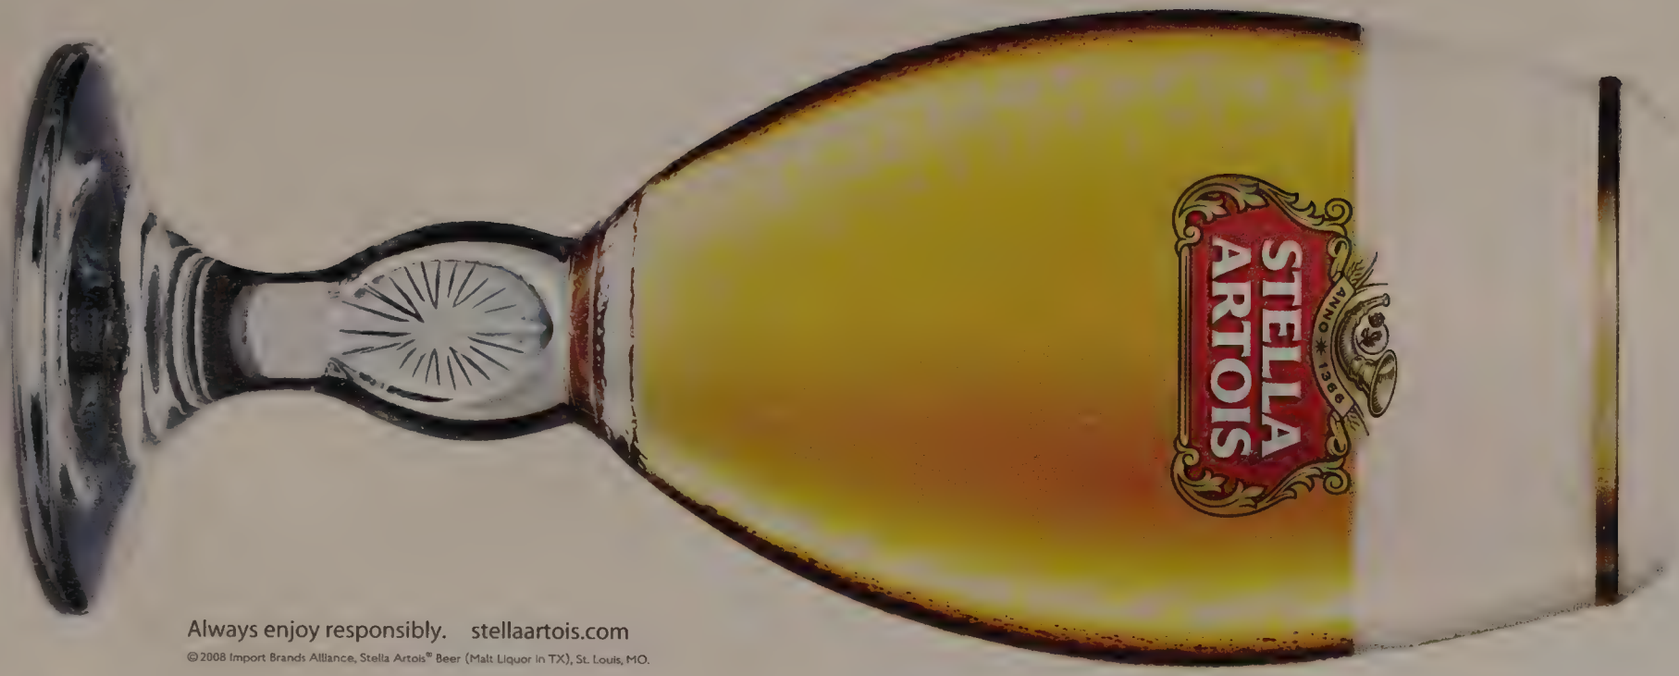
TO THE MARKET

Jean-Georges to return

JEAN-GEORGES VONGERICHTEN is coming to town… again. The celebrity chef of celebrity chefs first arrived in Boston back in 1985 to open the restaurant Lafayette in the Swissôtel. Vongerichten left the next year to take over as executive chef at Lafayette in New York, and since then he's been racking up awards and opening restaurants whose geographic locations range as far afield as their cuisines.

Now, it's Boston's turn. Come October, Market by Jean-Georges will open its doors inside the W Hotel at 100 Stuart St. Described on its Web site as "the restaurant as casual family kitchen," it's at least the fifth in a series of Market by Jean-Georges outlets in Vancouver, British Columbia; San José del Cabo, Mexico; Doha, Qatar; and Atlanta, Ga.



OVER AT FORT POINT CHANNEL, Persephone/The Achilles Project has closed after less than two years. Persephone featured upscale food and cocktails, while Achilles offered chic clothing, but apparently the lack of parking and less-than-central location played a role in the project's demise. Wherever they are, fashion-plus-food projects around town (Louis/Restaurant L in Back Bay, Tess and Carlos/Pava in Newton) haven't set any kind of record for success.

ON A BRIGHTER NOTE, three South End spots are looking to expand. Pho Republique has plans to move into larger digs, and both Flour Bakery + Cafe and Petit Robert Bistro are actively seeking sites to accommodate additional outlets. Rumor has it that Flour may expand into suburbia, while PRB is tracking down another urban venue.

Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. stellaartois.com

CHOW, BELLA

Pazzo brings fresh Italian flavors to Newbury Street.

TOP CHOP Entrees like the thick rack of Berkshire pork outshine a lackluster decor.

IN ITALIAN, THE NAME MEANS "crazy," but the execution at this Back Bay eatery is clearly the product of a sound mind. Boston foodies will recall Bill Bradley's debut a decade ago at Bricco in the North End, a time when serious young chefs were lifting the veil of red sauce that had shrouded that neighborhood's cuisine. Bradley brings to Pazzo the same instincts that he demonstrated at Bricco, Carmen and Rustic Kitchen, where he was culinary director.

At Pazzo, comfort food meets finesse. An ambitious menu lists almost 50 offerings in categories ranging from stuzzichini, or tiny appetizers, to pizzas and pastas, to secondi, the Italian term for meat and seafood main courses. Bradley's creativity sings in small tastes like tender leaves of grilled artichoke ($8) with lemon, mint and feta cheese, but more often he satisfies the Newbury Street constituency with large portions of old favorites like thinly sliced prosciutto and homemade mozzarella with bruschetta ($12).

A sprightly tomato sauce with fresh basil accompanied arancini telefono ($8), three ping-pong-ball–sized spheres of succulent saffron rice and mozzarella deep-fried to a golden brown, perfect for the after-work crowd. Sausage, ricotta and roasted-pepper pizza ($11) also provided a reliable snack, while the sophisticated beef carpaccio ($12), served with a piquant mustard cream, preserved lemon and Parmesan gelato, could hardly be called bar food. Sautéed shrimp and Tuscan white bean passatina ($11) suffered from flavorless shrimp, but the crunchy texture and the chili-spiked bean puree made the dish satisfying nonetheless. An abundant serving of Venetian-style fritto misto ($12) with calamari, rock shrimp, cod and green beans served in a salt-cod box—■ signature Bradley presentation—displayed tempura lightness. It also served as a reminder that tempura is a Mediterranean creation, imported to Japan by Portuguese missionaries in the 16th century.

Pazzo's primi piatti reflected Bradley's winning ways with pasta. Tagliolini and clams ($19) showcased 10 fresh, tender Wellfleet clams in a balanced white-wine and clam-broth sauce enlivened with chili, garlic and fresh tomatoes. Six large and silky seared scallops distinguished risotto ($21), studded with al dente cuts of fresh asparagus, tangerine, peas and pea shoots. The variety of ingredients and the skill with which they were melded made this a formidable and elegant dish. Bucatini carbonara ($16), long, thick and hollow noodles in a sauce of pancetta, egg and cheese, was robust and homey.

Crème brûlée

Grilled rack of Berkshire pork ($22), an almost two-inch–thick triple-rib serving of tender, juicy meat, would've been a standout main dish had it not been over-broiled. The garnishes, a mountain of bacon-studded mashed potatoes and a medley of roasted carrots, parsnips and turnips, more than compensated. The spice-roasted chicken ($18) was crispy and superb, enhanced by fregola sarda (large-grain Sardinian couscous), earthy mushrooms, sun-dried tomatoes and roasted onions. On the maritime side of the ledger, pesto-grilled salmon ($19) arrived firm and moist with a refreshing salad of radishes, tomatoes, feta cheese, red onions, cannellini beans, asparagus and mint.

Prepared for a letdown at dessert, we found Pazzo's classic crème brûlée ($8) had a perfect consistency, while the flourless chocolate cake ($8) had an ethereal texture and an incredibly rich, intense flavor.

Less exceptional was the restaurant's decor—bare brick walls, stainless-steel accents, black tables and framed prints—and the noise level made conversation difficult. But a more serious distraction was the slipshod service on our last visit. Although we were among the first patrons early on a Sunday evening, we waited a full half hour for our appetizers. When they finally arrived, the fritto misto was lukewarm, suggesting it had languished on a counter. Then, while we were still eating, servers descended upon us with the next course.

Once the performance of Pazzo's front-of-the-house matches the terrific work done in the kitchen, Bradley should have another crowd-pleasing favorite. ✖✖✖

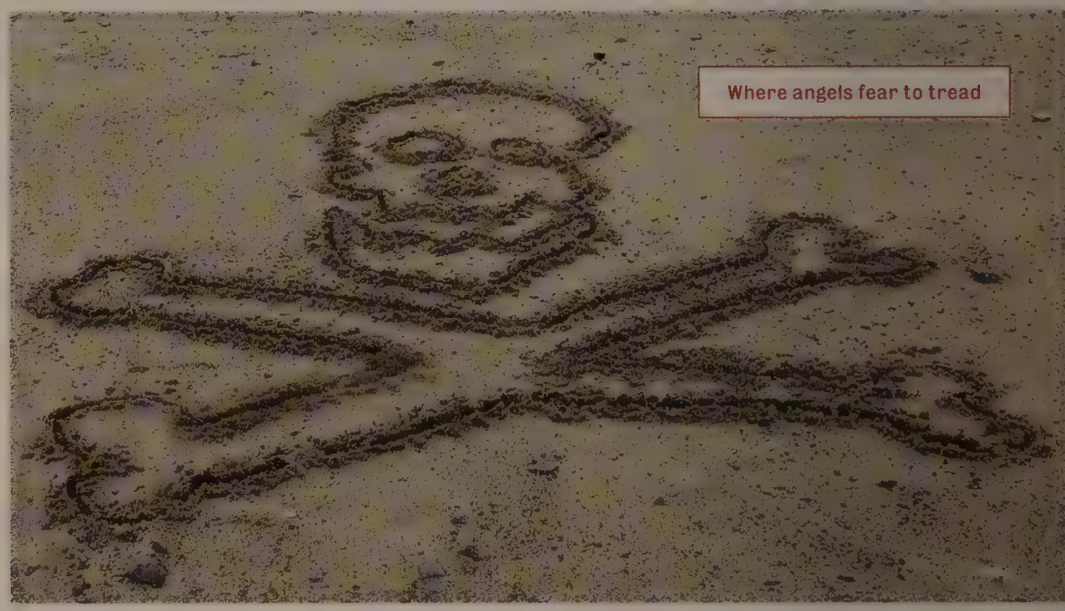
BEACH AND MOAN

How to survive the sand



AFTER AN INTERMINABLY damp summer, beach weather finally arrived, and I earnestly participated in my first "beach day." I use quotation marks because I don't think that two hours can honestly be claimed as a day. But my beach time was long enough to reach a few conclusions. I hereby posit that there are only three reasons for going to a beach:

1. The beach in question is artificial and situated next to a topless pool, a swim-up blackjack table and a bar.
2. You're trying to signal a passing ship for rescue.
3. You're liberating France.

The only other possible rationale for beach-going is that you're on vacation in the middle of winter, and the combination of sudden sunshine and tropical drinks induces a temporary euphoria that obscures the fact that you're engaging in a completely asinine activity. Why did the pioneers forge west, battling starvation and disease? Because they were trying to get as far away from the beach as possible. It's a tragic irony that their journey ended at another beach. The most iconic beach song ever, Jimmy Buffett's "Margaritaville," is about getting drunk because the beach is so annoying.

Considering we associate the desert with deprivation and misery, why then do we love a desert that happens to border an equally hostile environment—a vast tub of corrosive liquid filled with prehistoric predators, riptides, poisonous jellyfish, rogue waves, bloodthirsty pirates and frequently unsafe levels of doo-doo bacteria? If you want to save time without going to a beach, just throw a block of ice and a piranha in the toilet, then dip your feet while applying Banana Boat lotion with a random-orbit palm sander. But for those of you who still insist on patronizing the real beach, here are a few tips on how to best enjoy yourself.

Where angels fear to tread

PICK YOUR SPOT

Unless you arrive at the crack of dawn, the beach will already be full when you get there. Thus, you'll need to weave amongst squatters and inadvertently kick sand all over them, which may result in a severe beating from a leathery gentleman with a tattoo of the Hartford Whalers logo across his back. Once you find a place to set your towel, carefully position it so that sand doesn't get on top. Then enjoy the 30 seconds until some other hapless nomad trudges past and sprays sand deep into the fibers of said towel, which now has the fluffy, cosseting texture of a mangled chain-link fence.

TAKE A WALK

Initially, you'll scald your feet on the sand, so you should put on your flip-flops, which will then immediately fling sand into the straps, causing skin abrasion with each step. So ditch the flip-flops and streak toward the water to cool your frying soles. Near the high-tide mark, you'll encounter seaweed and jagged shells, which alternately make you slip or lacerate your feet. Finally, you'll reach the water, which, by virtue of warming in the sun all summer, is nearly 85 percent free of ice floes. With your feet in the water and the rest of you baking in the sun, enjoy the sensation of undergoing hypothermia and heatstroke simultaneously. Tired of having external testicles, or non-inverted boobs? Just wade a little deeper!

THINGS TO DO

Some people think the beach is boring, but there's actually a lot to do. For instance: Stare at cancer spots developing on your skin. Try to read, except the combination of sweat and/or sunblock will cause the ink to smear all over your hands (you could try a Kindle, but nobody likes to grab a sandy Kindle). Attempt to eat a snack while fending off advances from disease-riddled dump chickens, also known as seagulls. Construct a metaphor for your futile life—i.e., a sandcastle. Fall asleep and wake up with a sunburn so severe that your entire immune system shuts down. Rent an umbrella or a beach chair, often for as little as two to three times what it'd cost to buy in a store. Go body-surfing and get your face smashed into the bottom beneath the maelstrom of a crashing wave. Lose your wedding ring in the water (I've done this). Alternately, if you're not married, just throw $900 into the ocean. Get crapped on by a seagull (this happened to Heather). Play beach volleyball, and dive for a ball such that you whiplash your head into the sand and nearly knock yourself out. Take your top off. Please?

I'm only drawing on my own experiences here, but if you're creative you can probably think of even more things to do at the beach. Like, if you're lying on your back, try lying on your stomach. The possibilities are endless. But the summer isn't—so I'll see you at the beach! By which I mean, I'll see you as I drive past it. ✖✖✖

THE MONEY GAME

The investment business as a state of mind

EVERY FAMILY IS a soap opera, some more unbelievable than others. I feel qualified to speak about this stuff because I've been watching over people's money for many years and listening to their stories. A client made a needlepoint pillow for me years ago. The motto embroidered on it says, "You never know anyone until you deal with their money." It's true. Money brings out the best and the worst in people. Tough clients turn out to be pussycats and your biggest supporters. Those who seem wonderful turn out to be hellions, with lives full of torment which they take out on you. If you're thinking about a career in finance, realize that the stock market isn't a real business. It's a state of mind, an Alice in Wonderland ramble through all of the emotions from fear to greed, with the seven deadly sins mixed in. If you're good at theoreticals and using your imagination, and you're curious about people, it could be right up your alley. The payoff? Trying to solve problems in a creative way and listening to stories about how people live their lives.

Let me share two tales of recent vintage that demonstrate what I mean by "You never know anyone until you deal with their money." A trust-and-estates lawyer was introduced to me. He arrived at my office looking like central casting had sent a true man of God. He embodied the word "conservative" in his dress, his language and his demeanor. God forbid I should utter a "damn" or a "hell" in front of him. He went on about spiritual retreats and the divine. I thought he cared about his clients and represented them well. But he seemed to preach a lot to me about the Almighty, and how I should make certain commitments to the Lord, being sure I was a card-carrying Episcopalian. When I told him one day that, indeed, I was Jewish, I thought his heart would stop, and that he could see the horns erupt from the sides of my head. From then on, he tried his hardest to convert me. One day, his wife called and asked to visit. She seemed frustrated, fidgeting with the purse on her lap. "I have to tell you about my husband," she said.

"What about that servant of the Lord?" I said with a straight face.

"I was going through his desk looking for some bills, and I discovered, all wrapped in sheet music of Bach fugues, a dozen disgusting tapes... and some disgusting pictures as well. He's a Jekyll and Hyde, and I want a divorce." Just when we think nothing can surprise us, life has a way of belting us between the eyes with reality.

Another story involves a handsome client who was interested in show business. One day he walked into my office and announced, "I know I'm really good-looking, and I want to be a star. You're gonna help me get there. Who do you know in Las Vegas?" His route to Hollywood was to start as a dealer in Vegas. "Movie people are there constantly," he reasoned. "They'll see me in action, discover me, and I'm off to the races." He called frequently, trading in mad emotional bursts of frenzy, as if needing to pay me for the therapy of our conversations. Often we would be in and out of his stocks on a daily basis. Crazy. And I told him so. "You'll never make any money trading this way. I'm not going to take these orders." He started school in Vegas and brought a new element to our relationship: He began introducing hookers over the phone. "They really want to plan for their future," he said. "Mutual funds, stuff like that. Way too boring for me." He traded his own money into dust, dying way too young, handsome but doomed. You never know anyone until you deal with their money.

Families can be a killer, of course. I had three sisters as clients years ago, with trusts for their benefit that required all of their approval for any investing to occur. They were not talking to each other, and every money decision had to be communicated individually, then to their lawyers and accountants, until I finally gave up and resigned the accounts. In closing the relationships, each sister claimed, "I'm the reasonable one. They're far from it." Serious problems in families almost always begin over money.

These stories are small glimpses into the heart of the investment business. And I'm not even telling you about getting dead bodies shipped from Sicily to New York, or American Express cards that need to arrive in a day to entitled, young ex-pats in Katmandu, or bailouts to an ex-preppie midwife living in the back of a Chevy near an Indian reservation, or getting official name-change documentation to convert from Jewish to Buddhist "for the sake of world peace." Isn't this a great advertisement for joining the industry? Come on down! ×××

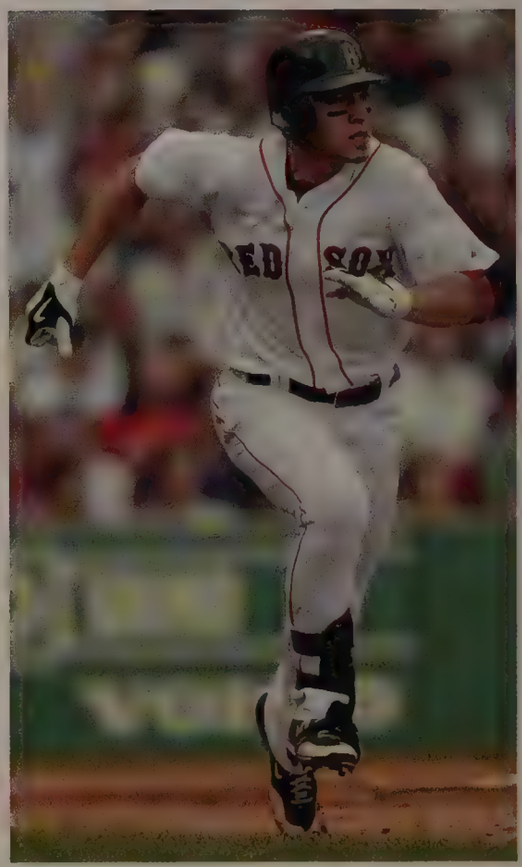
Dave Roberts: "Youkilis... far... hit..... ball?!"

2 PATS POISED TO BREAK OUT



Knight in Shining Dreadlocks Is he the next Lawyer Milloy or the next Dexter Reid? Our gut says the former, but with his third NFL season on the horizon, and the Pats secondary desperate for a leader, it's high time for Brandon Meriweather to either prove it, or head back to the Seventh Floor Crew.

All About Adalius A broken arm took him down last season, but with Jerod Mayo and Derrick Burgess by his side, there's no stopping Adalius Thomas in '09. The guy's got the agility of a bobcat, and the speed and strength of a hippo. (Seriously, those things are fast. The Discovery Channel said so.)

5 SUMMER STORYLINES

Take a Pitch, Son At press time, Jacoby Ellsbury is second in the majors with 53 stolen bases. Amazingly, he did this while only ranking 93rd in on-base percentage. We've said it before, but a little patience at the plate might be the only thing standing between Ellsbury and legendary base-stealing status. Now, if only Dave Magadan were still alive...

Sleeping With the Enemy With Leon Powe officially joining Delonte West in LeBron's army, we wonder: How are we supposed to genuinely hate the Cavs when they employ our two favorite former Celtics? Oh, right! Anderson Varejao! Word...

Holy White Guy, Batman! Where the hell has Belichick been hiding Julian Edelman? You see, this is what separates BB from the coaching pack. While the rest of the league spent the last two years bitching about how they missed out on Wes Welker, Belichick was in the lab, hard at work on Welker's Mini-Me. Would it be passé to make Edelman wear Number Two?

Francona Under Fire Whether it was pitching to Longoria, sticking with Tek or pinch-running Madam Buchholz, the normally untouchable Sox skipper has caught his share of stink this summer. Does Francona deserve some blame for the Sox's recent woes? Yes, he does. To say otherwise is to disrespect what he accomplished in '04 and '07.

Minute Man The Celtics have their Baby back, but there's still a lingering issue. At the end of last season, Big Baby was playing the role of Kevin Garnett (36 minutes/13 shots per game); coming into this year, he'll be the second or third guy off the bench. It's clear that Baby—who's as emotional as a drunken movie star—thinks he's worthy of big-time NBA minutes. So what happens when those minutes disappear?

4 DATES TO WATCH

8/31 The 2009 U.S. Open kicks off in Flushing, N.Y., with its controversial new tag line: "Our chicks grunt louder than yours."

9/1 The Sox head to Tampa for a huge three-game set against the Rays. So huge, in fact, that Tropicana Field officials will consider expanding the stadium parking garage to two floors.

9/2 Patriots center Dan Connolly turns 27. Of course, this begs the question: "Who the hell is Dan Connolly?"

9/3 For the fifth straight year, the Pats close out the preseason against the Giants. And for the fifth straight year, you'll only be watching if you have a gambling problem. (See you there.)

1 ONE WORD FOR THE VIKINGS BANDWAGON

Done. Cooked. Finished. Ancient. OK, that's actually four words, but they all describe Brett Favre. You want to say that he's still one of the best QBs in the game? Fine. Then we say John Smoltz is still a top-notch closer. What? Come on! But he used to be so good!!

HEN FAMED ALL STAR PITCHER & WORLD SERIES WINNER JOSH BECKETT PUT A SIDEWINDER ON HIS WRIST.

the last thing we at the Bozeman Watch Company thought was that we'd be developing a new design directed by such a renowned Boston athlete.

Greatly inspired by the beautiful 7000 acre Herradura Ranch and Josh's passion for perfection in everything he does, Christopher Wardle, Bozeman Watch Company's CEO set out to commemorate the Texan and great Boston pitcher with a timeless and rugged piece. Sketch illustrations soon revealed a Herradura as exquisitely detailed and understated, as Josh himself. The movement is a robust 27 jewel, Val Grange movement that is produced in the Grenchen Valley of Switzerland for the Bozeman Watch Company. After construction of the specialty movements, each individual piece undergoes testing in Geneva by the COSC or Chronometer Institute guaranteeing its mechanical accuracy to be amongst the best in the world. The end result, power with passion, the best homage Christopher felt he could provide Josh was a rugged yet refined timepiece, in the style of Josh Beckett himself.

CYNTHIA ROWLEY

Soroff On CYNTHIA ROWLEY

The celebrity designer tackles tutus, fashion rags and Project Runway.

MAVERICK DESIGNER CYNTHIA ROWLEY, 51, opened a boutique on Newbury Street this year, the latest of her 60-odd worldwide stores. A native of the Midwest, Rowley was seven when she made her first dress and had already sold her freshman collection to some of the country's top retailers by the time she graduated from the Art Institute of Chicago. Her clothing is carried by Bergdorf Goodman and Saks Fifth Avenue, among others, and she's won the CFDA Perry Ellis Award for Womenswear. A judge on Project Runway and a regular on the pages of every fashion magazine from Allure to Vogue, Rowley's the author of the best-selling Swell book series. She has two daughters and splits her time between Manhattan, Montauk and the rest of the world.

Jonathan Soroff: Is fashion about fun or fabulousness?
Cynthia Rowley: Can't it be about funabulousness?

Silliest thing you ever sent down the runway?
A girl breaking through a 10-foot-tall pane of candy glass, only it didn't quite shatter. The piece that was left hanging swung down and nearly decapitated one of the models.

Most egregious fashion trend you helped perpetuate?
The tulle tutus we're shipping to our stores as we speak.

Is there a current trend you find completely annoying or ridiculous?
I like really, really high platforms and heels, but I was wearing a pair yesterday that I swear nearly crippled me. I needed a walker to get back to the office. I would advise kids today to become chiropractors.

Is there a designer that you're jealous of?
Maybe I'm jealous of someone who can design something amazing like a space shuttle—a scientist or [an] engineer.

Favorite item to design?
[Something] innovative and frivolous together. You know those Snuggies? I was thinking they should make them out of terry cloth for the beach.

Is Fashion Week fun or drudgery?
It's terrifying and torturous and completely the most elated experience you can have.

Is fashion, by definition, silly?
I have to say a firm and heartfelt, capital N-O. I do think clothes can change the way you feel about yourself, and it's self-expression. It can make you feel sexy or strong, or add to your confidence or self-esteem.

You're really big in Asia…
[Laughs.] Like I'm a loser here. I'm the David Hasselhoff of fashion…

What would you attribute that to?
I have a very American take on a more artistic and creative sensibility that works for Japan.

Three things every woman should have in her wardrobe?
I would say sunglasses for those rough mornings, an investment handbag and sexy lingerie.

Are designer labels worth the cost?
People buy designer labels for different reasons, and if you're well-informed, it is. In some cases, the tailoring is superior, or the originality and uniqueness of a piece.

First thing you judge someone by, style-wise?
They say you should look at their shoes, right? But I personally try to get the whole package.

Are male fashion designers misogynistic?
No, but I do think it's maybe an advantage to be able to think, "Would I wear this?" and to actually wear it.

Ever leave the house in sweatpants and Crocs?
I have a story about Crocs, but I can't repeat it. Suffice it to say, no.

Project Runway: a Cinderella story or crap?
They do a pretty good job of representing the actual trials and tribulations of the industry. I wish there was another show that explored all the other career options. Not many people get to be designers, and there are a lot of other things to do in the fashion world.

Favorite fashion magazine?
I can't say that! My favorite fashion magazine is whichever one has the biggest story about our company. Just kidding. My real answer is that the only thing I read is The Improper Bostonian.

Any pet peeves about fashion magazines?
You're just determined to ruin my career, aren't you? They'll be like, "It was all going fairly well until that phoner with Jonathan."

Is it possible to write about fashion without sounding like a vapid twit?
I always think it's hard to verbalize something so visual and subjective.

One thing you'd never be caught dead wearing?
Just one? Hot pants spring to mind. [Laughs.] There used to be nothing. Now it's an age issue. I'm not going to be sporting a crocheted midriff–bearing top.

Item of clothing you find yourself wearing most?
Jeans. But that's boring. I'm lucky; I can wear whatever I want to work.

I wear a lot of vintage stuff, too.

Favorite color?
Does rainbow sparkle count? That's what my kids would say. It depends on the day.

Are fashion shows entertainment or serious business?
Aren't they the ultimate balance of art and commerce?.

Will whalebones make a comeback?
Never! Unless you're talking about some innovative thing that isn't a torture device. I think we've moved beyond binding women up.

Fill in the blank: _____ is the new black.
Oh, no! OK. Leather is the new black. ×××

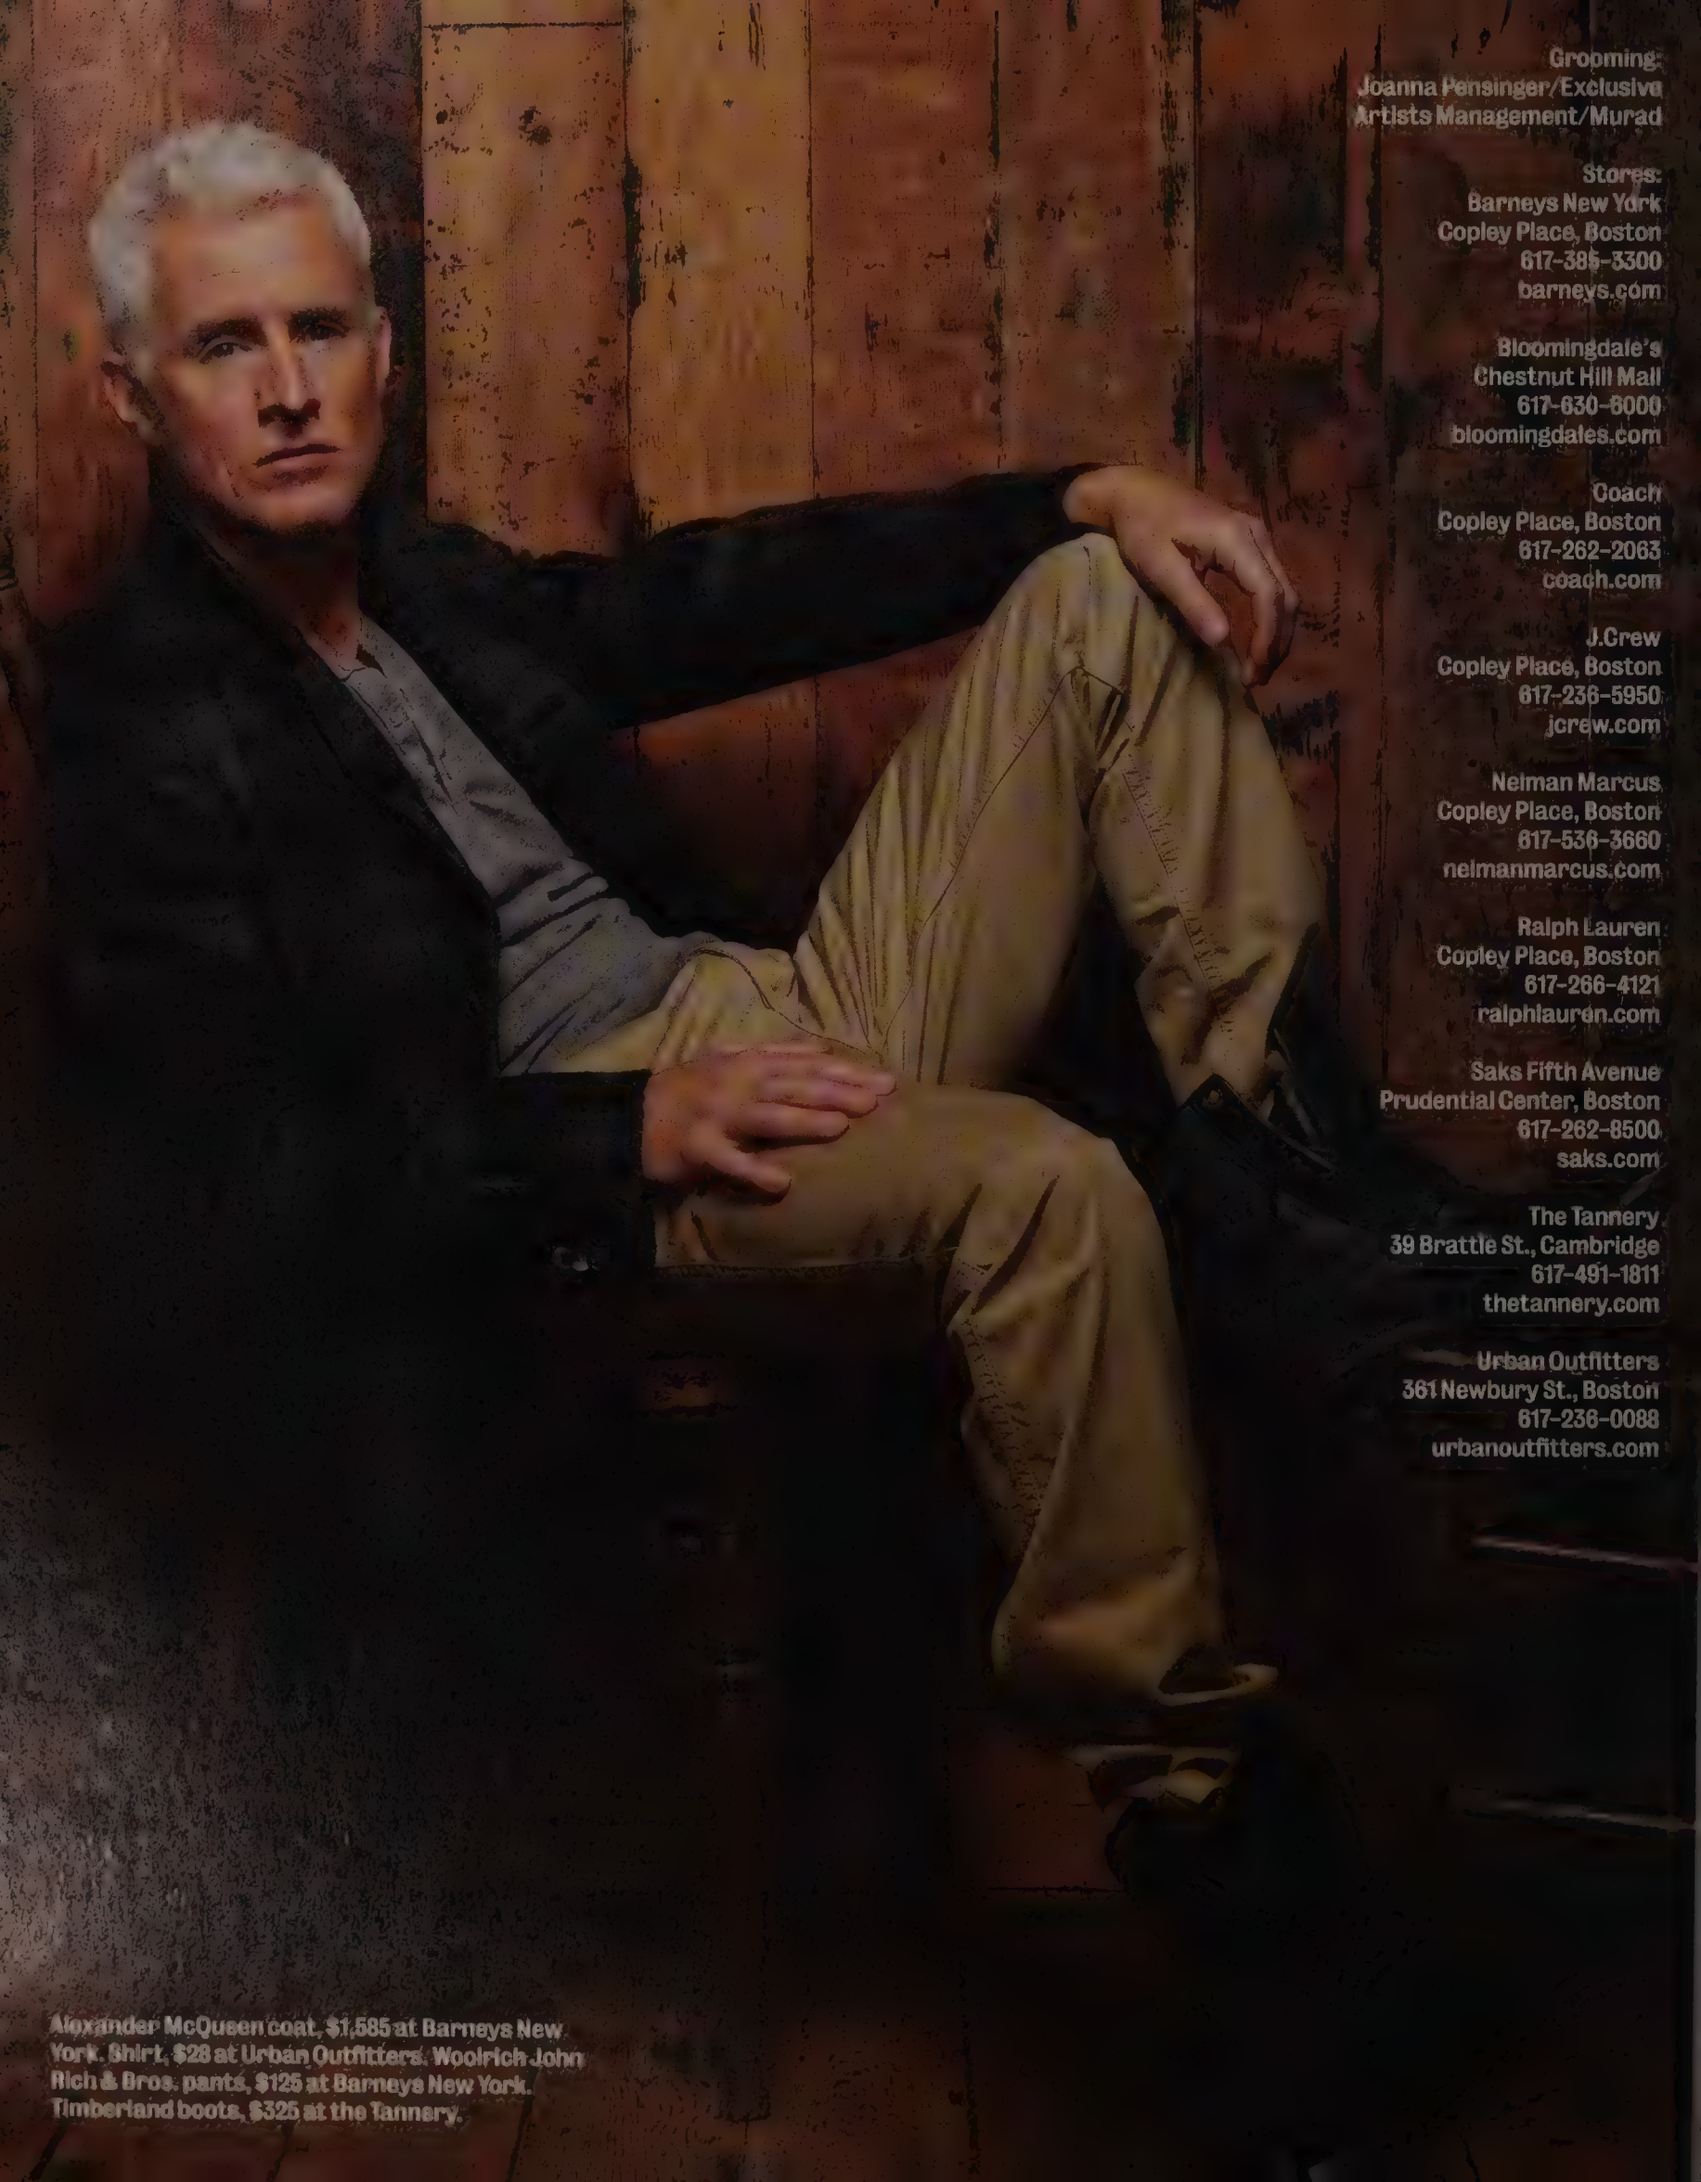
AT THE SHOOT



John Slattery perches casually on the hood of a vintage Mustang convertible at The Improper fashion shoot. Slattery, 47, appears completely at ease in jeans, boots and a pea coat—a surprisingly laid-back look for the guy who plays ad agency exec Roger Sterling on Mad Men. Most images show him in a '60s-style, three-piece suit, his uniform on the critically-acclaimed AMC show that recently started its third season and earned him his second Emmy nomination. Yet the surfer and avid Massachusetts sports fan (he was born and raised in Boston) tends to leave the formal dress on set. Says Slattery, "Lately, I've been playing a lot of people in suits. Early on I played several parts with no clothes at all. It'd be nice to split the difference." Strolling the streets of New York—his home base with wife Talia and son Harry—Slattery more resembles Paul Newman as Butch Cassidy than he does his TV alter-ego (or his character, Howard Stark, in next year's Iron Man 2). Which is why he's the perfect model for fall's rugged clothing.

LOFTY INTENTIONS

Fall's grown-up glamour combines strong silhouettes and dramatic details, striking a tough tone that's far from girlie.

BY RUTH BASLOE
PHOTOGRAPHS BY KIM KENNEDY

THE LITTLE BLACK DRESS
Using innovative draping and fabrics, designers revamped the ubiquitous LBD, making this timeless essential fresh and modern.

Lanvin dress, $3,190 at Barneys New York. Badgley Mischka necklace, $650 at Neiman Marcus.

STRUCTURED COAT
You spend all winter in it, so your coat's worth the splurge. Here, terrific tailoring and elaborate construction transform heavy wool into a strikingly feminine shape.

Prada coat, $2,395 at Neiman Marcus. The Row leggings, $1,700 at Barneys New York. Giles & Brother necklace, $175 at Dress

POLISHED PLAID

Save last year's grunge-inspired flannels for the weekend. Bold and graphic, the new plaids come in curve-hugging dresses and smart suits that work well at the office.

Dress, $525; scarf, $225; and gloves, $150. All at DKNY. Repetto shoes, $220 at the Tannery.

THE BOLD SHOULDER

We're not talking '80s shoulder pads (although they've made a comeback, too). These voluminous sleeves are softer, evoking the glamorous silhouettes of the 1940s. Balance a dramatic top with a simple, slim skirt or skinny jeans.

Dolce & Gabbana jacket, $2,195; blouse, $1,495; skirt, $1,260; and Adriana Orsini earrings, $300. Altier Sally Fifth Avenue.

NEW KNITS

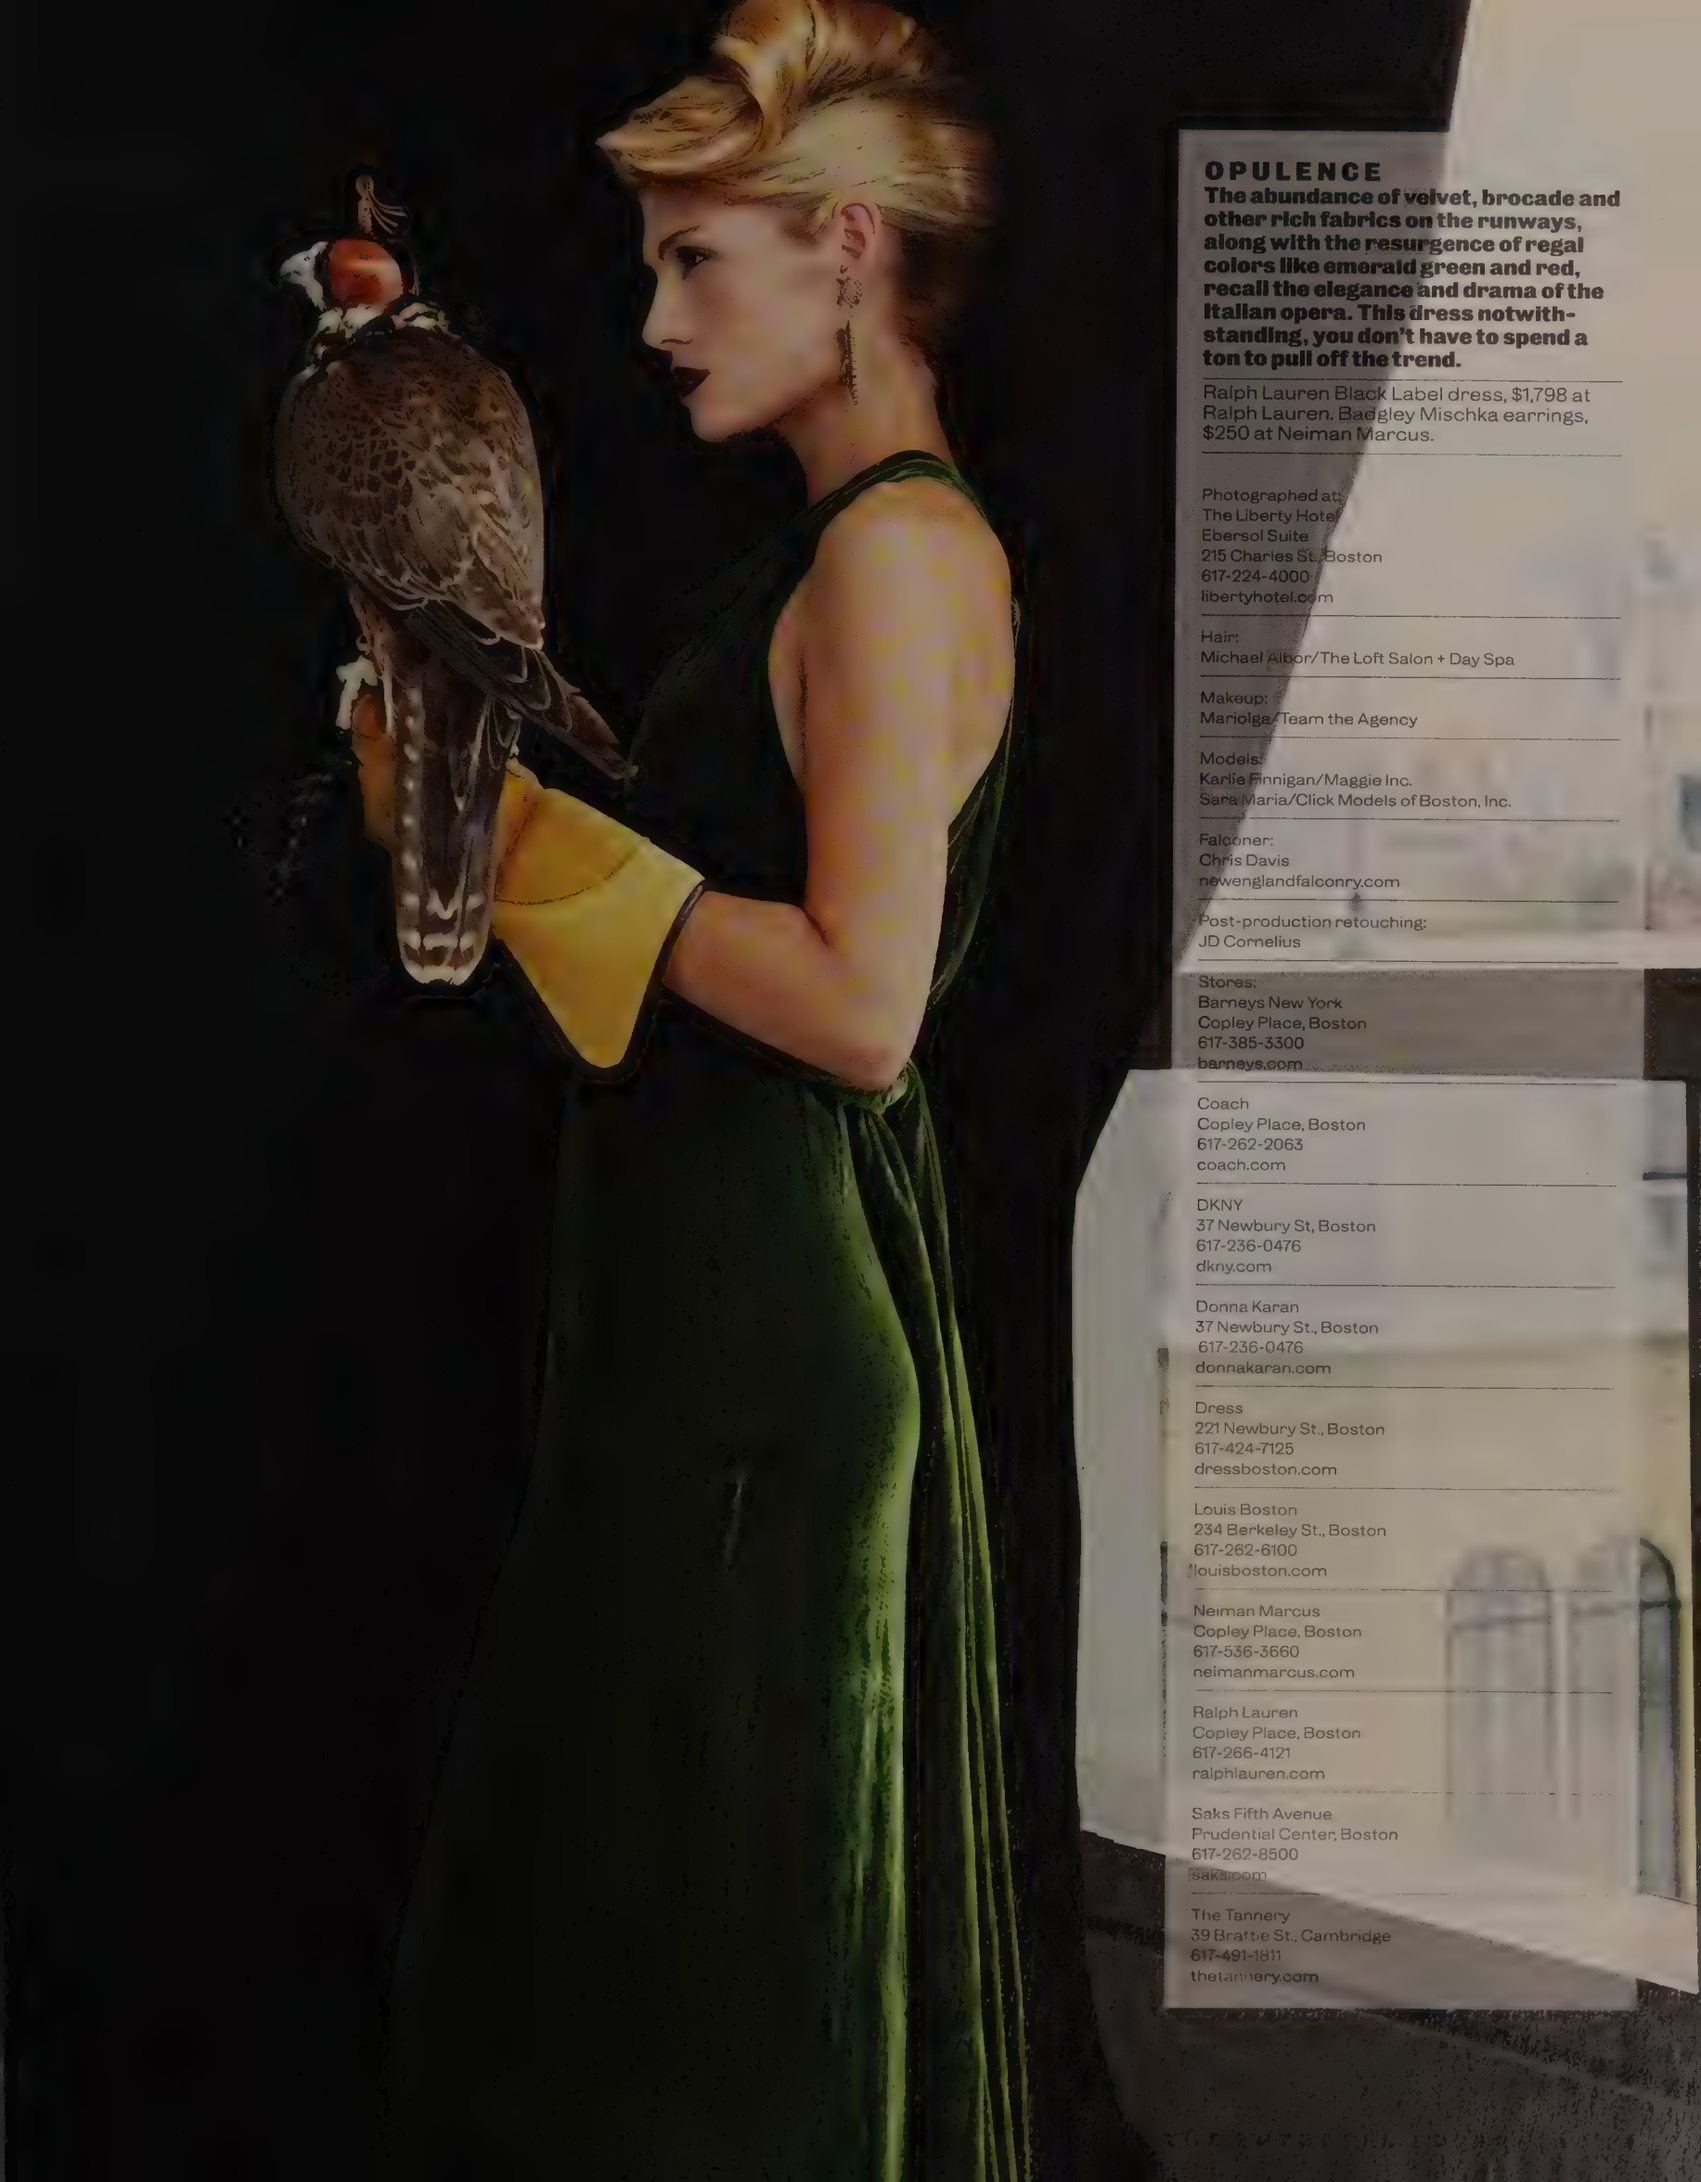
Melys dress, $795 at Louis Boston. Boots, $528 at Coach. Giles & Brother necklace (worn as a bracelet), $175 at Dress.

ORIGAMI PLEATS
They may bring to mind boring kilt skirts, but fall's pleats could pass for couture or even artwork.



Dress, $4,500, and belt, $450. Both at Donna Karan. Giles & Brother earrings, $100 at Dress.

LUXE LEATHER

You'll find fitted dresses, stretchy leggings and sleek jackets in leather that feels more refined than your biker basics. Pair them with classic tweeds like this blazer.

Helmut Lang dress, $840 at the Tannery. Boy by Band of Outsiders jacket, $1,555, and Giles & Brother necklace, $550. Both at Barneys New York. Chanel boots, $1,325 at Neiman Marcus.

OPULENCE

The abundance of velvet, brocade and other rich fabrics on the runways, along with the resurgence of regal colors like emerald green and red, recall the elegance and drama of the Italian opera. This dress notwithstanding, you don't have to spend a ton to pull off the trend.

Ralph Lauren Black Label dress, $1,798 at Ralph Lauren. Badgley Mischka earrings, $250 at Neiman Marcus.

THE ASCENT OF CLAM

JASPER WHITE'S Summer Shacks bring a beachy vibe to their landlocked locations. But on Thursday nights on Spectacle Island, Summer Shack hosts a sunset clambake on the water. Hop a 15-minute ferry ride (or show up with your own boat and tie up at the marina) and be greeted by a lavish spread arranged on a pier facing the city. Then sit at a picnic table, eating clam chowder, lobster, steamers and watermelon while the sun sets over the water. There's music and a giant bucket of rey beers. This is a good scene.

Ticket prices range from $56 to $75, but make sure to book online by 2 pm the day of the feast.

Big Time Under the Big Top

Stretch Run

In Spanish, "alegría" means jubilation, but this Cirque du Soleil show features acts called "Manipulation," "Contortion" and "Fire-Knife Dance"—terms that might have you hoping to escape unscathed. (Spoiler alert: You will.) On Aug. 26–30 at the Agganis Arena, watch these performers bend, twist and fly through the air in ways you wouldn't have imagined possible. And though they make it look easy, remember not to try the stunts at home. Compound fractures tend to cut down on the jubilation.

Away We Go ★ ½ This is my least favorite kind of movie: one in which nothing is learned from others and no common humanity is shared. There's just a succession of straw-man arguments for a sad worldview that's established in the beginning and remains unchallenged all the way to the end credits. Literary supercouple Dave Eggers and Vendela Vida make the case for their own moral and intellectual superiority by penning roles for John Krasinski and Maya Rudolph, who play two go-nowhere goofballs having a baby. They decide to travel the country to find parents to model themselves after, only to realize that—despite having nothing to say or precious little to offer—they're much better off than all the rest of the cartoonish losers. It's a noxious ode to generational entitlement, and I swear, if I ever see another "soulful" shot of a movie character staring blankly into the camera while twee acoustic guitar music plays on the soundtrack, I'm going to travel back in time and kill Zach Braff before Garden State ever happens. (In the suburbs.)

Cheri ★★ ½ There's a mini Dangerous Liaisons reunion going on in Stephen Frears' latest. The director gets back with acid-tongued scribe Christopher Hampton, here adapting another French bedroom saga for star Michelle Pfeiffer. But the past 21 years have taken their toll, as Pfeiffer now plays a sassy, brassy woman of a certain age. (You know you're getting old when Pfeiffer is getting Glenn Close roles.) Culled from two novels, Hampton's surprisingly slender script begins with Pfeiffer's aging courtesan Lea agreeing to babysit slatternly Kathy Bates' wayward, dissolute son, Cheri (Rupert Friend). It's obvious that these two are crazy for each other, but societal mores won't allow it, so one hastily arranged marriage later, we're watching Michelle Pfeiffer elegantly suffer her way through a belle époque riff on He's Just Not That Into You. Frears is savvy enough to toy with his front-loaded iconography, using cinematographer Darius Khondji's harsh natural lighting to turn this twisted farce into a meditation on Hollywood's horrific treatment of aging actresses. (In the suburbs.)

Cold Souls ★ ½ Demonstrating that not only has she seen Being John Malkovich but also that she liked it, writer/director Sophie Barthes' shamelessly derivative first feature proves that screenwriter Charlie Kaufman is a singular voice not easily imitated. In the film, the invaluable Paul Giamatti, playing himself for no discernable reason, discovers a pseudo-scientific agency that can extract and store the human soul for the dark times in your life when pesky emotions become too much of a bother. Bafflingly enough, Barthes plays this fertile concept not for farce, but as a dull, plodding thriller, complete with nasty Russian gangsters and a mournful, weary tone. The recently soul-free Giamatti performing Chekkov's Uncle Vanya in lecherous, Shatner-esque overdrive is the movie's lone comic highlight, as the rest of the picture falls victim to dreary metaphysical proclamations and labored genre mechanics. Wintry Moscow landscapes and a white retro-futuristic, Kubrickian set-design give Cold Souls a chill that not even Giamatti's trademark hemming and hawing can thaw. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

District 9 ★★★ With wit and originality to burn, writer/director Neill Blomkamp's scrappy little debut begins as a satirical mockumentary regarding a Johannesburg refugee camp full of crustacean-like aliens nicknamed "prawns." Stranded some 20 years ago when their mothership stalled out over South Africa, these ghastly-looking creatures suffer an institutionalized racism that smartly, if not subtly, skewers the country's history of apartheid. Sharlto Copley stars as a bumbling bureaucrat from a Halliburton-esque conglomerate charged with relocating the prawns to a newer yet even more dismal camp. Copley's such a hilarious, ineffectual blowhard that District 9 calls to mind the original, BBC version of The Office, except with aliens. Alas, the movie drops the documentary angle after the first act and settles into routine shoot-'em-up territory. The action is propulsive and often ghoulishly funny, but the movie deflates as it goes along. After you've watched a doomed alien race become obsessed with cat food and Nigerian prostitutes, gunfights aren't as engrossing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

SADIST CINEMA

Tarantino's latest is a bloody jumble that wastes his potential.

Inglourious Basterds
★★½
Starring Brad Pitt, Mélanie Laurent, Christoph Waltz, Michael Fassbender, Diane Kruger and Eli Roth. Written and directed by Quentin Tarantino. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

Francois Duhamel

I WAS IN FILM SCHOOL WHEN Pulp Fiction exploded into theaters like a cherry bomb in a schoolhouse toilet. Quentin Tarantino was our Elvis.

Much has been made of the democratizing effects his early pictures had on film culture, as they meld art-house affectation with rot-gut genre tropes and treat Charles Bronson and Jean-Luc Godard as equals. But for my money, Tarantino's genius was always as a sly observer of human behavior, tweaking societal codes of conduct by inserting banal, everyday disputes into archetypal B-movie scenarios. Pulp Fiction still works as a Jane Austen comedy of manners because you remember the debate over foot massage in greater detail than the mob hit that follows.

But after Jackie Brown—Tarantino's most mature film and one that grows richer with repeat viewings—he disappeared for six years. The artist who reemerged with Kill Bill and Grindhouse was a profoundly different animal. Gone is Tarantino's loopy affection for misguided characters, and his movies now seem to take place in an alternate universe that grows ever more cartoonishly violent and removed from anything beyond junky pop culture.

Inglourious Basterds is another frustrating outing from this undeniably gifted filmmaker. For all intents and purposes the Kill Bill of WWII movies, it's got a handful of scenes so smartly crafted and divinely inspired that the film is impossible to dismiss. But the great moments are adrift in a sea of juvenile self-indulgence.

Shuffled, like most Tarantino movies, into non-linear chapters, Basterds lurches across occupied France, presenting a cheerfully vulgar and mad alternative history to World War II. The adorable, if rather childish, idea at the film's heart is that cinema can win wars. Time and again, characters are rescued from harm by their encyclopedic knowledge of Leni Riefenstahl flicks and the work of GW Pabst. Nitrate film even becomes a powerful weapon against the Reich. It's a fantasy in which Germany's most popular movie star works as a double agent for the French Resistance, and (much to my delight) a film critic is a dashing British spy.

But then there are the Basterds. Led by Brad Pitt's hillbilly lieutenant, the title team is a gang of young Jewish grunts dropped behind enemy lines to savagely dismember every Nazi they can find. (Or, in Pitt's unfortunate accent, "Nahtzhee.") There's the lurking potential of a potent revenge fantasy, particularly since Jews are too often portrayed in WWII pictures as timid victims.

> There's a fetishization of cruelty and a wallowing in gore for giggles.

Too bad these sequences bring out the worst in Tarantino. There's a fetishization of cruelty and a wallowing in gore for giggles as Pitt's mostly indistinguishable charges scalp and torture their prisoners with wiseass abandon. Though it was a bloodbath, Reservoir Dogs was weighed down with genuine human suffering—the infamous ear-slicing scene more horrifying than humorous. Contrast that with just-for-yuks bits like Pitt shoving his finger inside a woman's bullet wound, and it's impossible to ignore how far Tarantino has regressed. (More than once I found myself muttering, "Come on, Quentin, you're 46.")

Despite being the focus of the ad campaign, the Inglourious Basterds serve little purpose in the film, as the majority rehashes Tarantino's scorned-woman fixation. Mélanie Laurent stars as Shosanna Dreyfus, a Jewish refugee and sole survivor of a massacre carried out by Christoph Waltz's delectably sinister Colonel Hans Landa. Now running a Parisian movie house under a false identity, Shosanna finds herself hosting a gala premiere for Joseph Goebbels' latest propaganda film. Before long, her own personal vendetta dovetails with an Allied effort dubbed "Operation Kino."

Tarantino has been talking up Inglourious Basterds for at least a decade, finally rushing the movie into production just over a year ago. It has the jumbled feel of a much larger, longer work that's been hastily culled into an ungainly two-and-a-half hours. Pivotal characters like Shosanna remain ciphers, while bit players are lavished with attention only to be abruptly wiped off the screen. Stylistically all-over-the-map, the film even briefly becomes a blaxploitation movie narrated by Sam Jackson, just to give us the rambling back-story of a marginal figure.

Yet, infuriatingly enough, there are sequences of sheer brilliance. A phenomenal midmovie set-piece finds our starlet double agent (Diane Kruger) and the aforementioned handsome film critic (Michael Fassbender) undercover in a basement tavern swarming with drunken German soldiers. Running at least a half-hour in length, the scene is a masterpiece of sustained tension, shifting alliances and unexpected reveals. Tying into Basterds' cinema-crazy themes, here we have an actress and a critic relying on performance skills and movie trivia to save their lives—a loving remix of the pivotal part in Reservoir Dogs in which Tim Roth rehearses his character's cover story as if auditioning for the role of a lifetime.

It's the kind of exhilarating sequence that reminds you what a fresh voice Tarantino was, and leaves you with the faint hope that he might someday live up to his earlier promise. ✖✖✖ fact that the female lead is indeed regrettably named Summer—that this debut from music video director Marc Webb has no shortage of the cutesy indie quirk that usually causes this critic to retch in his popcorn bag. But a funny thing happens on the way to Juno territory, as the film keeps alternating between twee, look-at-me set pieces and lacerating truths not often depicted in romantic comedies. Joseph Gordon-Levitt falls head-over-heels for wide-eyed Zooey Deschanel, and the screenplay by Scott Neustadter and Michael Weber shuffles their ill-fated courtship into jarring, haphazardly juxtaposed days of blissful puppy love, waning interest and abject misery. It's basically He's Just Not That Into You for boys—with half of the running time spent warning you about the dangers of over-idealizing your object of desire, and the other half settling for banal, sitcommy tropes like the wise-beyond-her-years kid sister. It's a shame the movie keeps sheepishly backing away from its sharpest insights. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Funny People ★★★ Rambling and self indulgent, super-producer Judd Apatow's third directorial effort finds the auteur of today's man-child comedy craze struggling mightily with his growing pains. An awkward though endlessly fascinating film, Funny People is the kind of deeply personal project you can only get away with once you've already banked a billion for your home studio. Adam Sandler turns in a self-lacerating performance as a sell-out star content to sleep with groupies and turn out crap flicks until diagnosed with a potentially fatal blood disease. Alone and miserable, he adopts Seth Rogen's struggling stand-up as a gag-writing lackey and torments the young comic while attempting to repair his own life before it's too late. It's a deeply hostile, uncomfortable picture that exposes the raw, competitive nerves that drive many comedians to ruin. Like most Apatow flicks, it's poorly directed and at least a half hour too long, but Funny People proves itself to be brave and uncompromising. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

G.I. Joe: The Rise of Cobra ★ ½ As far as mega-budget blockbusters based on 1980s' toys and cartoons go, director Stephen Sommers' G.I. Joe is a slightly more pleasurable experience than Transformers 2. But then again, so is a colonoscopy. Sommers is the attention-addled auteur who brought you Van Helsing, and as usual, he seems incapable of helming any interaction that doesn't involve at least three swooping crane moves and a background littered with flying digital crap. Whether the Joes are in power-suits ripped off from Iron Man, or feuding ninjas are soaring though the air clashing swords, the laws of physics don't apply. As none of the objects on-screen appear to weigh very much, the incoherent destruction turns tedious quite quickly. An explosion that flattens Paris becomes such an absurd spectacle, with so many demolished cars, colliding trains and prominent landmarks laid to waste, it feels like a live-action remake of Team America, but without the jokes. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Hangover ★★★ This summer's out-of-nowhere blockbuster boasts a can't-miss premise: after a bachelor party gone wrong, three addled buddies wake up to a sea of Las Vegas sleaze, with no idea what happened to the groom. A bleary-eyed detective story follows, as these staggering malcontents attempt to piece together the previous evening. Director Todd Phillips, who helmed the similar man-child favorite Old School, still hasn't mastered the pacing required for such screwball comedy, but his cast comes to the rescue. The Office's Ed Helms once again uses his outward dorkiness to conceal a deep-seated anger, and star Bradley Cooper can't help but bring an unpleasant aggression to a character presumably intended to be much more endearing. The off-kilter energy is hammered home by alt-comedy icon Zach Galifianakis, who steals every scene not nailed down with his deadpan, wildly inappropriate reactions and perverted asides. The movie isn't always as funny as it likes to think it is, but this trio makes it feel dangerous. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince ★★ The previous Harry Potter film, 2007's rousing Order of the Phoenix, was a first for the Potter-verse: a stripped down, focused humdinger that finally felt like one of JK Rowling's beloved tomes had been effectively re-imagined in cinematic terms. For once, this Muggle began to understand what all the fuss was about. Alas, it's back to business as usual at Hogwarts with returning screenwriter Steve Kloves (who penned the first four but sat out the most recent picture) again transcribing an aimless grab bag of moments that don't serve much purpose beyond offering fans of the series some pretty pictures to look at. Sumptuously shot by the great cinematographer Bruno Delbonnel, the film is devoted to long scenes of folks delivering grave passages of exposition. All setup and no payoff, Half-Blood Prince never feels like a movie in its own right, just a lot of logistical scaffolding required to set the stage for the final chapter. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Hurt Locker ★★★★ Director Kathryn Bigelow delivers an exercise in pure craftsmanship, and perhaps, not coincidentally, the first Iraq War movie worth a damn. This pulse-pounding excursion to the front lines eschews political hand-wringing or sermonizing in favor of following an explosive disposal crew, dismantling deathtraps with a surfeit of rotten luck and sick gallows humor. Jeremy Renner delivers a ferocious, star-making performance as Staff Sergeant James, an adrenaline junkie so heroically spectacular at his job, it hardly matters that the rest of his life is a disaster. A succession of jaw-dropping suspense set-pieces, the first hour of The Hurt Locker initially stakes a claim as one of the greatest war movies ever made. Eventually it settles for merely being one of the best films of the year, as Bigelow and screenwriter Mark Boal take a detour to probe James' peculiar psychopathology, with results that are rewarding, though less visceral in their impact. It's a cruel, bitter and brilliantly assembled picture. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

In the Loop ★★★ ½ In director Armando Iannucci's scabrous Iraq War satire, a misfit band of lackeys bump up against heavyweight players on the eve of the invasion—a delicate time in which even an inconsequential sound bite can blossom into a media phenomenon. Supremely savvy in regard to the power of words within our media, In the Loop drops a numbskull British Cabinet member (Tom Hollander) into the weeds of an international debate, with his every vacuous utterance spun and repurposed by forces on both sides of the argument. Peter Capaldi's shadowy political fixer fulminates with exquisitely potty-mouthed rage, eventually meeting his match in James Gandolfini's Colin Powell clone. The two square off in an aria of schoolyard insults so epic I actually applauded. Visually inert but aurally astounding, the movie plays recent tragedy for cynical farce. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

tail heretofore unseen in the oeuvre of dreaded rom-com writer/director Nora Ephron. Meryl Streep is predictably glorious as Julia Child. Propped up on lifts and padded out to Child's imposing linebacker frame, Streep nimbly apes that famous warbly voice and bemused laugh as she clomps around the set like a delightful giantess. It's a warm, affectionate portrait full of clumsy, earthy humor. Less effective is Amy Adams as Julie Powell, who battles the depression of post-9/11 New York City by blogging her attempts to cook every recipe in Child's first book. The script proceeds on two tracks, skipping back and forth between Powell's experiment and Child's early years at Le Cordon Bleu. Pleasantly short on plot, the movie merely invites us to watch these characters discover what they do well. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Public Enemies ★★★★ Form becomes content in Michael Mann's audacious take on the final days of John Dillinger, a bank-robbing cowboy adrift in a modern world. Johnny Depp tones down his usual theatrics to play the master thief as a man just out of prison who's living for no future or no past, just an extremely precarious present. Shooting in trembling, hi-def digital video with mostly handheld cameras, Mann upends the traditional grammar of a gangster period piece and avoids the expected establishing shots of lavish 1930s art decoration in favor of nerve-jangling close-ups and experimental editing techniques. The deliberately alienating style doesn't just mirror the immediacy of Dillinger's moment-to-moment existence, it also makes explicit his bafflement at this shimmering new landscape, where both J. Edgar Hoover's Bureau of Investigation and Frank Nitti's mafia goons employ technological wonders that render an old-school desperado like our hero obsolete. Love it or hate it, Mann's technique is some sort of breakthrough. (In the suburbs.)

Star Trek ★★★ ½ What a wonderful surprise. It takes serious gall to recast characters as iconic as Captain Kirk and Mr. Spock with fresh-faced barely-knowns. Sure, there's a shiny coat of CGI paint and everybody's impossibly good-looking, but director JJ Abrams has captured the upbeat sense of adventure that defined Gene Roddenberry's original 1960s' series. More so than any Trek project in decades, this one captures the camaraderie, the easy humor and, most important, the swagger that we associate with the headstrong Kirk and his logical, pointy-eared pal. Much like Casino Royale, Abrams' Star Trek finds ingenious ways to serve up familiar pleasures. Rare for a landscape dominated by dour popcorn blockbusters, this one isn't afraid to be fun. All the phaser battles, sexy green girls and transporter beam antics you'd expect are present, just with slightly unexpected spins. The film's rousing finale ends with the Enterprise crew at last assembled and warping off to what we can only hope will be a happy series of sequels. May they live long and prosper. (At Simons IMAX and in the suburbs.)

Summer Hours ★★★ ½ French writer/director Olivier Assayas often suffers from a pedantic streak a mile wide. But this quiet, devastating family drama plays to his strengths, with three squabbling siblings sorting out what to do with their late mother's estate. Playing the heartsick eldest, Charles Berling attempts to keep the family's posh country compound intact as a refuge for future generations, while younger

Juliette Binoche and Jeremie Renier just want to cash in and move on with their cosmopolitan lives. Assayas pays as much attention to the objects in the frame as he does to these characters, as he lavishes furniture or the artwork on the walls with symbolic importance. Saying a lot, but never out loud, the film allows the dispersal and auction of these material things to stand in for the dissolution of a family over time. (In the suburbs.)

The Taking of Pelham 123 ★★ Director Tony Scott's pointless remake of Joseph Sargent's 1974 classic keeps the basic premise, as a scenery-chewing John Travolta hijacks a Manhattan subway car, much to the chagrin of Denzel Washington's weary, everyman dispatcher. But this slick redux misplaces the attitude, which is everything. The original wasn't much of a nail-biter but still remains a cherished cult favorite thanks to its time-capsule vision of a crumbling, battle-weary New York City. Scott's hyperactive version employs web cams, Wi-Fi gadgets, freeze frames and swooping helicopter shots of overwrought car crashes to oversell a story that was already foolproof. Only James Gandolfini, playing a disgraced mayor waiting out the end of his term, musters a level of droll cynicism that matches the previous picture. (In the suburbs.)

Transformers: Revenge of the Fallen NO STARS Michael Bay has outdone himself and made a movie bigger, louder, longer and dumber than the godforsaken original Transformers. Again, there's no sense of joy or whimsy, nothing but the pulverizing fetishization of militaristic,

A Whole New World

Great Escape

We're a sightseeing nation. We'll travel thousands of miles to glimpse a monument, a river or even a greasy diner. Lucky for the tired and broke, several spots are as close as the Museum of Science's IMAX Theatre. The documentary The Greatest Places showcases faraway landscapes in locations like the Amazon, Tibet and Greenland. You'll get acquainted with the inhabitants during an in-depth look at their daily lives. It's less hassle than long car rides and delayed flights. Consider it a staycation.

alpha-male privilege. All women are spray-tanned skanks dressed like strippers, and every minority is a grotesque, ineffectual cartoon. An early set-piece is devoted to savoring the destruction of a library. Then we meet "Amos 'n' Android"—comic-relief robots modeled on monkeys who speak jive and flash gold teeth. (Bay's big punch line is that they can't read!) Eventually, even President Obama gets dragged into this mess, here ridiculed for attempting diplomacy with gigantic killer robots. Luckily, our heroes know better, so when a bespectacled, articulate representative of the new administration argues for transparency and accountability, the good guys promptly throw him out of a plane and go save the world by invading a Middle Eastern country. There's also a robot with enormous wrecking balls dangling from his crotch that serve as destructive testicles. This is what you asked for, America. (In the suburbs.)

Up ★★★★ The geniuses at Pixar Animation Studios have done it again. This tall tale of an aging widower (voiced by Ed Asner) flying his house to South America with helium balloons has no right to be so emotionally powerful, but writer/director Pete Docter weighs down the bizarre flights of fancy with sharp human sadness. Somehow the movie manages to include a 13-foot female bird named Kevin, an army of talking dogs and some spectacular action sequences while never losing sight of the moving human drama. Breathtakingly animated, Up has more strange and beautiful images than can possibly be listed here, but perhaps none more so than the crumbling old home, born aloft by thousands of brilliantly colored balloons. It's a ridiculous conceit that pays off rich metaphorical dividends, as our protagonist must learn that it's time to let go. (In the suburbs.)

IN RECENT YEARS, WHEN African-American rockers from Rage Against the Machine to TV on the Radio have won acclaim without much focus on their race, it's hard to remember what the '80s were like for Living Colour.

"We had about as much chance at survival as a snowball in a pizza oven," says guitarist Vernon Reid, whose band finally scored a major-label deal with a demo produced by fan Mick Jagger. With the 1988 release of the multiplatinum Vivid, the ground suddenly shifted for the all-black rock quartet.

a smash video for the hit "Cult of Personality," which also earned a Grammy Award for Best Hard Rock Performance.

Today, that song has been revived on Guitar Hero III, which has sold 14 million copies. "It was a real shot in the arm in terms of the band staying relevant," Reid says, adding of that song, "It's speaking about something constant, our addiction to personality—even more so now.

"I remember conversations with Tom Morello [of Rage Against the Machine], and he was like, 'Dude, your record came out and that meant I could do what I was doing,'" Reid says from his Staten Island home on the eve of Living Colour's first U.S. tour in five years (hitting Johnny D's Sept. 10) and the release of a new CD, The Chair in the Doorway.

The band smashed a stylistic stereotype, whereas Reid notes earlier groups like War, the Isley Brothers and Parliament Funkadelic were marginalized from the rock label. Living Colour tackled race and society in songs like "Open Letter (to a Landlord)," "Which Way to America?" and "Funny Vibe," which included a cameo from Public Enemy rappers Chuck D and Flavor Flav and huffed, "No, I'm not gonna rob you.... So why you wanna give me that funny vibe?"

But the group's eclectic musical prowess has always kicked it home, drawing on funk, soul, jazz and African music as well as metallic rock. Reid splices his crunching riffs with runs of blurring speed and sonic swoops that nod to guitar hero Carlos Santana. He completes a virtuoso unit with brassy singer Corey Glover, Berklee-molded drummer Will Calhoun and volatile bassist Doug Wimbish, who laid grooves for such seminal hip-hop hits as "The Message" and "White Lines" before he replaced Muzz Skillings in 1992.

The band smashed a stylistic stereotype, whereas earlier groups like War and Parliament Funkadelic were marginalized from the rock label.

"The roots of Living Colour are in this mixmaster where there's Led Zeppelin, King Crimson, Funkadelic, James Brown—a cauldron of all these different things," Reid says. He even played knotty, Ornette Coleman–inspired jazz fusion with Ronald Shannon Jackson's Decoding Society, actually appearing with the group at Johnny D's about 25 years ago.

"Without the Decoding Society, there would have been no Living Colour," the 50-year-old guitarist says. "I'm very much a proponent of the idea that the avant-garde is necessary. The avant-garde literally is the leading edge, and becomes the mainstream, or an aspect of popular culture."

Alas, Living Colour's brush with the mainstream only lasted a few years. Although the band released an explosive second CD, Time's Up, and played the inaugural Lollapalooza tour, a darker 1993 disc, Stain, didn't fare as well, and Reid dissolved the group in 1995. Living Colour reunited in 2000, but released only 2002's Sept. 11-informed Collidescope, touring sporadically since.

Reid is upbeat, however, about the true-to-form The Chair in the Doorway. New songs like "Burned Bridges," "Behind the Sun" and "Deca-Dance" roar and ruminate around identity issues, laced in echoes of grunge and occasional electronic rhythms. "I don't believe in inertia," he says. "We haven't thrown in the towel in terms of having something to say." ***

J. Michelle Martin-Coyne

Space Odd-yssey

Lipping Up to Boston The Flaming Lips are best known for their eccentric shows and odd album titles, but the wizards of psychedelic pop-rock can also throw a fantastic, cosmic party. Formed in 1983, Wayne Coyne's band has gone through a lot of makeovers, but their stage presence remains eternal. Trippy synthesizers, distorted keyboards and '70s guitar effects combine with confetti, lasers and, on occasion, the sight of Coyne walking over the audience inside a giant, plastic bubble (this sort of spectacle won the Lips a place in Q magazine's "50 Bands You Need to See Before You Die" list). Creative multitaskers, the group recently released a holiday-themed movie called Christmas on Mars. Even weirder, "Do You Realize??," the most emotional track of the band's 10th album, Yoshimi Battles the Pink Robots, was declared the official rock song of Oklahoma, the band's home state. While there are lots of reasons for Bostonians to count themselves lucky that the Lips burn up the Bank of America Pavilion on Aug. 30, one of the odder ones is the reassurance that having an open-air venue guarantees enough emergency exits in case of spontaneous combustion.
